

The Lost Country

–2–

“The Dreaming City”

by
Wayne Kyle Spitzer

Copyright © 2020 Wayne Kyle Spitzer. All Rights Reserved. Published by Hobb's End Books, a division of ACME Sprockets & Visions. Cover design Copyright © 2020 Wayne Kyle Spitzer. Please direct all inquiries to: HobbsEndBooks@yahoo.com

All characters appearing in this work are fictitious. Any resemblance to real persons, living or dead, is purely coincidental. This book contains material protected under International and Federal Copyright Laws and Treaties. Any unauthorized reprint or use of this book is prohibited. No part of this book may be reproduced or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying, recording, or by any information storage and retrieval system without express written permission from the author. This ebook is licensed for your personal enjoyment only. This ebook may not be re-sold or given away to other people. If you would like to share this book with another person, please purchase an additional copy for each recipient. If you are reading this book and did not purchase it, or it was not purchased for your use only, then please purchase your own copy. Thank you for respecting the hard work of this author.

The Flashback/Dinosaur
Apocalypse Cycle

WAYNE KYLE SPITZER

Flashback

(re-printed in Dinosaur Apocalypse)

Flashback Dawn

(re-printed in Dinosaur Apocalypse)

Tales from the Flashback

(re-printed as Dinosaur Rampage)

Flashback Twilight

(serialized as A Dinosaur is a Man's Best Friend;
re-printed as The Complete Ank & Williams, Dinosaur War, Paladins)

A Reign of Thunder

(serialized as Heat Wave, collected in The Lost Country [book], Escape from Seattle)

A Survivor's Guide to the Dinosaur Apocalypse

(collected as Dinosaur Carnage, and in The Lost Country [book] and Escape from Seattle)

The Lost Country: The Series

We would have been quite the sight had there been anyone left alive to see us, rumbling up N. La Brea Avenue in Gargantua One—we’d disengaged the electric motor and were running the 16.1-liter diesel only, but that’s another story—the expedition vehicle’s stainless steel hull glinting back at us from the shop windows and its parabolic antenna whirling; its great pistons rattling.

“Rollin’ down—the Imperial Highway, with a big, nasty redhead at my side,” Sam sang along with the stereo. “Santa Ana winds blowin’ hot from the north, and we were born to ride ...”

“Jesus, not again,” moaned Lazaro. He reached past her toward the deck but she batted his hand away.

Nigel, meanwhile, had to shout over the music: “You want to follow La Brea all the way to Hollywood Boulevard—then hang a right. We’re looking for Gower Street.”

“Looks like it’s going to be smooth sailing,” said Sam.

I glanced out the side window as we passed Pink’s Hot Dogs—the awning of which was covered with moss and vines—saw startled Compies scatter like mice. “Let’s hope Roman’s mission is going as well.”

Black Mr. Fantastic—please; he’d nicknamed himself—was skeptical. “At a big base like Lewis-McChord? I doubt it. That place is one big Army surplus store now. You really think he’s going to just waltz in there and fly out with an Apache?”

“Hard to say,” I drawled. “But I do know this: If he succeeds, and if we’re successful in securing Eagleton’s bunker, nothing will be able to touch us again. That is, if it’s still, how shall I say it? Available.”

“It will be,” said Nigel. “Because nobody knows it’s there.”

“Except you,” sneered Lazaro. “His former lawn guy. Isn’t that it?”

“Ya, mon—that’s right. I told you: he showed it to us while we were working. Just rolled up in his 1947 Packard one day and started jabbering like we were best friends. Nice guy—sharp as a whip. I knew it was him right away because I’d seen him on The Tonight Show; and because he was wearing those same tinted glasses he likes so much.”

“Well, what if he’s there?” asked Sam.

“He won’t be. He never actually lived there, as I said. It was just one of his passion projects—like this rover was for Steve Dannon.” He fell quiet as though in deep thought. “Ain’t it a shame. All those luxuries—the swimming pool, the indoor park, the gourmet galley—not to mention the food stores and hydroponics—all of it just sitting there, collecting dust. Meanwhile, there’s people living in cardboard boxes.”

“Or was,” said Sam.

“Yeah, but, he gave, too. Like, a lot,” I said. “I went to college on one of his scholarships. Read him all the time when I was younger—he was kind of a hero to me. Never thought I’d be barnstorming one of his homes.”

“You never thought you’d be running from dinosaurs, either,” said Sam. She reached over and wiggled my cheek—roughly. “And now look at you go.”

“Okay, here it is,” said Nigel. “Take a right.”

I took a right—swinging the giant rig onto Hollywood Boulevard, watching the big streetlights pass absurdly close to the windshield. “It won’t be long. We’re going to want to—”

“Whoa, whoa, whoa,” said Mr. Fantastic, having noticed the thing—its startling blue, its clean, perfect white—even before I did. “Slow, slow, slow. Go back.”

I left off the gas and applied the brakes—which hissed and squealed, like scythes—bringing us to a complete stop. Then I backed up—the different torque causing the gears to rap and wind—until we had drawn alongside the banner and the cycad trees supporting it.

At last Sam said: “Okay, Batman, riddle me this. What’s stranger than a Donald J. Tucker banner in the middle of L.A.?” She turned to face Mr. Fantastic.

We all turned to face him—our very own Reed Richards; the Nutty Professor to our Desert Isle. Our Dr. Zarkov.

“How about a Donald J. Tucker banner that was put here recently; as in, after the Flashback,” he said—and nodded at the trees. “Because those are cycads—bennettitales, to be precise, from the Upper Jurassic—not palms. And what that means, kids, is—we’re not alone.”

WE DROVE ON IN SILENCE, Sam having killed the music (The Best of Randy Newman, as I recall), past the TCL Chinese Theatre—where a pack of raptors were picking over the corpse of a diplodocus calf—past the Capitol Records Building (whose round, spired roof was crowded with seagulls and pterodactyls), then left on N. Gower Street and up to Scenic Avenue—which would take us to Beachwood Drive and on to the Hollywoodland hills. That is, had its shoulders not been choked with cycads and its roadway blocked by a black allosaurus (we were all pretty much experts on dinosaurs now): which had simply lazed over in the middle of the asphalt as though it were sunning itself—its long, sinewy legs stretched luxuriously and its tail straight and unfurled, its great, blood-red crests glistening.

“Oh, for fuck’s sake,” I said—and brought us to a gradual halt.

I honked the horn—taking note of the dead triceratops in the reeds (which was partially eaten), as well as the allosaur’s obviously full belly—but there was no response.

“Just go, man,” said Lazaro. “It’ll move. And if it doesn’t, so what.”

“He’s right, Jamie,” said Sam. “I don’t think we have time for this.”

I put it in gear and inched forward—revving the engine even as I laid on the horn, moving to within a few feet of it.

Still it did not move—only twitched a little as though it were dreaming; maybe flicked its tail once slightly.

“Jesus, are you kidding me?” I was beginning to lose my patience. “Let’s go! It’s time to pick ‘em up and move ‘em out.”

I inched still closer—until one of the thing’s outstretched feet vanished beneath what passed for the hood. Then it did move, rearing its head and gnawing at the push bar—only gently, playfully, like a cat disrupted from a nap—before getting up suddenly and shuffling aside; at which I stepped on the gas and we lurched forward—turning wide as we passed through the intersection; rumbling up Beachwood like an out-of-control freight train; breaking off heavy branches like twigs.

I looked into my sideview mirror even as Sam did the same, saw the thing bounding after us like a leopard, like a wraith, gaining rapidly.

“What is it?” snapped Mr. Fantastic. “What’s going on?”

I glanced between it and the road, accelerating rapidly. “It’s chasing us. Fuck. Better get up into the Crow’s Nest, Lazaro. Just don’t get trigger-happy; we’re gonna need the ammo. Nigel, I’m going to need you to—”

“It’d be best to just let it go,” said Mr. Fantastic. “I mean, what’s it going to do—bite through solid steel?” He put a hand on my shoulder, comfortingly, reassuringly. “Save the ammo, Jamie. It’ll give up before we get there.”

I looked around the cockpit: at the banks and banks of instrumentation, the suffocating array of dials and switches—before focusing on a glowing blue toggle; and flipped it. “I don’t know about you, Doctor ...” There was a thump-thump-thump as I turned to face him. “But where I’m from—they call that ‘borrowing trouble.’”

And then the smoke grenades had detonated and we were crashing through their clouds—at which I hit the brakes hard and hung an immediate left, skidding onto a side street, and whereupon we quickly circumnavigated the block to burst back onto Beachwood. Where we instantly realized—just before swinging north—that we could no longer see the street south of us; nor, for that matter, any evidence whatsoever of a pursuing allosaurus—black with red crests or otherwise.

I’D BE LYING IF I SAID I hadn’t already felt uneasy—even before we rounded the bend and saw the big pickups. Deronda Drive was that kind of road: the kind that started normally but then began to twist and turn, and to narrow, climbing all the while, so that the houses on both sides (some nearly palatial while others seemed little more than glorified hippie shacks) closed in all around us. Add to that the fact that we'd run out of places to turn back, and you can imagine how on edge we (already) were when we saw the crashed gate and the occupied vehicles beyond it.

Nor had those occupants taken long to train weapons on us—about 4 seconds, by my count—snapping them out through side windows and an open door even as the men in the payloads (one of which was equipped with a large-caliber machine gun and the other some type of rocket launcher) did the same.

And then there we were, faced off like the Hatfields and the McCoys—only we weren't ready—there beneath the sun in the Hollywoodland hills with the Santa Ana wind blowing and Gargantua idling and their blue and white Tucker flags fluttering, proclaiming "Keep America Great" and "No More Bullshit." As though there was still somehow a recognizable government—a recognizable enemy; something they could project all their fear and loathing and frustration onto, just as before. As though nothing had changed since the Flashback at all.

I reached up for the targeting goggles slowly, knowing the new windows were tinted but not wanting to take any chances, but didn't put them on. "Nobody get excited," I said. "It's just ... it's just a precaution."

"Oh, Jesus," whispered Sam.

"No, he's right," said Mr. Fantastic. "Because—see that rocket launcher?" He pointed at the truck furthest back—a black Dodge Ram with pig ear exhaust stacks and a custom lift. "That, my friends, is what you call bad news. Now, I don't pretend to know what that is, exactly, but what it reminds me of is the French MILAN ..." He got out of his seat and crouched in front of the windshield. "Okay. Yuh. See that dome just inside the barrel? That's the warhead. Big, right? Nasty, right? That's because it's an anti-tank weapon." He looked at Sam suddenly—to make his point, I guess. "It kills tanks, see. Stops them dead in their tracks. They've even been confirmed to have taken out a U.S.-supplied Abrams—that's the main battle tank of the U.S. Army—in Iraq, in 2017, during their conflict with the Kurds."

He turned to me before making eye contact with each and every one of us. "And you better believe it when I say, people, that that thing will cut through this hull like it's tinfoil. So Jamie's doing the right thing; providing he keeps his focus on that missile launcher. The question is, do we shoot first and eliminate the threat preemptively—by taking out the operator and anyone else who dares to go near it—or do we try to talk to them? Reason with them? Convince them we're not a threat?"

"But we are a threat," said Sam—softly, gravely. "We're here for the bunker. And so are they, obviously. Or they've seized it already. I mean, look at what we're driving. There's a machine gun on the roof, for—"

"I say we shoot first," interjected Nigel—after which he seemed shocked that he'd actually said it. "She's right, I mean—S-sandahl. Sam. We are a threat; and there's no point in trying to deny it. So are they. I mean, come on. You saw the banner. If that's not a territorial claim, I don't know what is. And they're white trash, anyway, mon. Stupid and dangerous on—"

"Yo, pound sand!" snapped Lazaro. "I voted for Tucker, too, you know, and I'm not some crazed redneck you can just ..." He trailed off suddenly and looked around—as if for approval—but nobody said a word.

"—on the face of it," finished Nigel, succinctly. He looked at Mr. Fantastic and then at me. "And you know it as well as I do."

I looked out through the long, narrow windshield: at the armed, thickset men—most of them were at last partially overweight—and their dirty, dark-colored trucks; at the poised rifles and trained, glinting machine gun, the rocket launcher with its big, tank-killing warhead.

Mr. Fantastic, meanwhile, had gotten back into his seat. "What's it going to be, Jamie?"

I unbuckled my harness and leaned forward, elbows on my knees—began rubbing my temples.

At last I said, "And this is the only way in? The only road that can be used?"

Paper rattled as Nigel shifted. "Mount Lee Drive, that's right. Winds all the way up to the City of Los Angeles Communications Facility, which is right above the Hollywood sign."

"And beneath it? The sign, I mean? That's our bunker?"

"About 50 yards down from it, that's right. Only accessible by air or on foot from there, since the private road from below was removed."

I peered out at the trucks, which shimmered in the heat. "How in the hell did they find out? That's what I want to know."

"Does it matter?" asked Mr. Fantastic. "Besides; we don't actually know that they have—we don't know anything, really. Not why or how long they've been here, nor how many of them there are, we don't even know if—"

"That's bullshit, mon. We know it's a train because that's how they roll; and we know there's more of them—probably up there rooting around because they've never actually been here and don't know what they're looking for. No, scratch that—they're probably on their way here, because these assholes have already radioed them while we sit here and have a goddamn debate about—"

"Nigel."

"About—"

"Nigel. Shut the fuck up."

"But ..."

"Here." I handed the targeting goggles back to him. "Put them on. Shut the fuck up. And put them on."

"Wait, what?" Lazaro just glared at me; it was almost as though I'd stabbed his mother. "Is this a joke?"

"I know, you're checked out on the internal gun control. But let's be honest, Dwayne. You don't want to hurt these people. Hell, they're like family, right?" I clapped him on the shoulder briskly. "Just one, big, happy Tucker Train. One big tent from Cabela's. Isn't that right?"

"What the hell are you talking about?"

"Sam, get the ramp," I instructed, and watched as she flipped the toggle—reluctantly.

"Because we're going to go meet your friends with our hands up," I said. "And you, sir, are going to do all the talking."

"READY?"

I looked at Lazaro and he looked back. "Ready." He squinted at me suddenly. "Why wouldn't I be?"

I shrugged. "No reason." I took a deep breath. "Okay. Remember, hands in the air."

He put his hands in the air.

Then we moved out; stepping into the sunshine from the cool shadow of the expedition vehicle, raising our hands as though we were surrendering.

"Easy does it ..."

There was a rattle of arms as they noticed us and hurriedly re-trained their weapons.

"Halt! Who goes there?"

Both of us froze. "A-Americans. Two of us," said Lazaro. "We want to talk."

The wind blew; the sun beat down. Nobody said anything.

"Daryl," snapped one of them at last—after which a skinny blonde dude stepped out (he couldn't have been more than 17) and seemed to hesitate; looking at us over his rifle, shifting his weight from one foot to the other, before shuffling forward quickly and giving us a pat-down—briefly, hurriedly. "They're good," he said.

The man who'd directed him to frisk us—he looked like John Goodman, I swear—motioned for us to come forward.

"That's close enough," he said, after we'd closed the gap. "Trent, Brady, Mitchell—cover us. Everyone else, hold your positions." He seemed to relax—slowly, grudgingly. "Americans, you say." He handed the skinny guy his weapon—some kind of long rifle, who knows. "That doesn't really feel complete to me. You say you're Americans. Which one?"

Lazaro and I glanced at each other.

"Both of us," said Lazaro, and straightened a little. "Born and bred."

Jesus, I thought, and rubbed my brow.

The man stiffened. "Hands in the air."

I raised my hands—after which he seemed to lighten, and just chuckled. "No, I mean: Which America?"

I looked at Lazaro, who hesitated. "The—the only one," he said. "The only America. Tucker's America." He feigned confusion. "What other is there? I mean; since the Flashback, that is?"

The man didn't say anything, only glanced at the skinny kid, whose face was a wreck of pimples.

That's when we heard it: the sound of diesel engines—lots of them—coming down the hill, coming down Mount Lee Drive.

He snatched the radio from his belt. "We're over here—in front of the trucks. We've got two of them," he said.

And then the trucks began to appear, rumbling down the service road like a cavalry, like an armored support column, black smoke billowing from their exhaust stacks and Tucker flags flying; their huge, aggressive-looking front grills gleaming, the radio and C.B. antennas whipping—until they'd made a parking lot of the base of the hill and their drivers had begun getting out—many of them wearing red hats and loud shirts, campaign buttons, red, white and blue leis—and all of whom headed our way and partially surrounded us; at least, until a singular personage—a towering man in blue jeans and a black T-shirt, who wore a strikingly-sculpted beard and a gleaming white Stetson—parted them like the Red Sea: the MAGA Nephilim, the “No More Bullshit” Moses, and joined our little drum circle.

“They say they want to talk,” said the first man, “but I wanted to wait until you got here. We, ah, we don’t know anything yet.”

The man in the Stetson just looked at us, his hands on his hips. Then he took a few steps toward Gargantua and paused, his great, broad back facing us.

His silence seemed to make the first man uncomfortable. “What do you think? You, ah, ever seen anything like it?”

The towering figure didn’t move, didn’t budge, only continued staring at the stainless steel vehicle, which gleamed beneath the sun.

At length he said: “Devin tells me you want to talk.” He paused to clear his throat. “That you—that you got something to say.” He reached up slowly and stroked his beard—thoughtfully, meditatively—before turning to face us. “So say it. Talk. You can start with your names. I’m Denton.”

We both just looked at him, unsure how to begin.

“I’m Jamie,” I said, and held out my hand. “Jamie Klein. This here is Lazaro.”

He looked at my hand as though he was uncertain what to make of it. Then he gripped it; gently at first, but then squeezing suddenly and briefly, crushingly—if only for an eyeblink. Message received, I thought.

He shook hands with Lazaro.

I chose not to waste any time: “We’re here for one of the parabolic antennas,” I lied. “From the Communications Facility. Our engineer thinks he can use it to replace our existing one, which is malfunctioning.”

Denton raised an eyebrow—as though that wasn’t what he’d expected. He glanced at Gargantua and then back to me. “For that?”

I nodded, saying nothing.

"I see," he said. He raised his chin abruptly. "So you're not—affiliated with anyone? FEMA? Red Cross? The United Nations?"

I shook my head.

"NATO? EUFOR?" He looked us up and down, first me, then Lazaro. "No. I don't suppose you are." He indicated Gargantua again. "And the rig?"

I told him the truth: that someone in our group had known about it before the Flashback, in Seattle, and that after the time-storm we'd stolen it. And that that was all—

"Seattle?" exclaimed the first man, 'Devin,' incredulously. He harumphed. "I thought you said you were Americans."

Denton suppressed a smirk. His eyes had lit up at mention of Seattle too. "That where you're from, Jamie Klein?"

I could see where this was going. "Originally—yes. But we left the shithole to seek a warmer climate, a southern climate." I looked him directly in the eye. "And better people. Loyal people. Like you." I looked around at the others. "Like all of you."

He followed my gaze, seeming to appreciate the sentiment (although it was hard to tell, really, because he was squirrely, this Denton: a sidewinder dressed as a straight-shooter). "Well, I'm glad you feel that way, Jamie. I really am. But we've got a problem—several of them, actually. The first is, we can't let you do that: take the antenna. As part of the Array, it's got to go—it's got to be destroyed. Second, we're not currently accepting—which is to say, if you're looking to join our train, we can't take you. And the third is—we've already claimed this land. Hollywood, that is. Everything from Beverly Hills in the south to the Santa Monica foothills in the north—it's, ah, it's ours now. I'm thinking you probably noticed our banners. Oh, yeah. And the fourth." His blue eyes met my own, piercingly, unflinchingly. "You're trespassing. And you need to leave. Like, now. Also—if we see you again," He shrugged, real cute-like: "We'll execute you."

I looked from him to Devin and onto the pimply kid. “So that’s it. No discussion, no compromise; not even a reason why.”

“There’s a reason. It’s because there’s important work that needs to be done.” He half-turned to face the others. “Isn’t that so? Isn’t there important work to be done?”

“Important work,” said a woman in a foam campaign hat, and smiled. “American work.”

“To end the Chinese Flashback,” said someone else.

“And detonate the charges,” said another. “To knock down the Array.”

I must have looked confused. “I—Okay. What’s the Array?”

He raised an eyebrow sharply. “You mean you don’t know?” He looked from me to Lazaro. “Neither of you?”

“Yeah, I know,” said Lazaro. “It—it’s a secret high-power, high-frequency transmitter ... said to be somewhere in the U.S.” He looked at his shoes as though vaguely ashamed. “Some say it’s Chinese. Others say deep state. You know ... conspiracy stuff.”

Denton just looked at him. “Conspiracy stuff,” he said. He began pacing around us. “Well, let me tell you—Lazaro from Seattle—we’ve been up there, to this so-called ‘Communications Facility,’ and there ain’t nothing normal about it; all right? Fact is, it’s been designed to look like just another antenna farm, that’s how it’s stayed hidden all these years. Another fact is: it’s home to the second High-frequency Active Auroral Research Program, or HAARP², which just happens to be what caused the Flashback.”

He circled back around to face us and paused. “Got it? That’s what started it all, see. That’s what brought hell down upon us.” When neither of us said anything, he added, “They were messing with the ionosphere, man, don’t you get it? That’s what let Them in ...” He indicated the lights in the sky, which hadn’t been particularly active since we’d left Seattle. “That’s when They became aware of us. When They—how did H.G. Wells say it? ‘Drew their plans against us.’”

Everyone seemed to look at me, I have no idea why.

"You're fucking crazy," I said. "You—you've totally lost it."

"Have I?"

"It's a fucking antenna farm, Denton!" I glanced around us at the throngs of people. "I mean, is that what you people actually believe? Christ, did it steal the election, too? Is that what kind of bullshit you're trying to pass off?" I glared at Denton. "We're done here. Let's go, Lazaro."

"Now wait just a fucking—"

And he lunged at me—which was followed by the sound of Gargantua's .50 caliber swinging around, locking into position. Which was followed by it ratcheting down, down, until it was trained on Denton alone.

"Nobody move!" he shouted, splaying his hands, even as there was a riot of shifting arms. "Is that clear?"

But nobody did; move, that is, not even when Lazaro and I walked back the way we had come and ascended the ramp into Gargantua; where I gave the order to retreat and go back down the hill and Sam did, operating the rover like a champ—even though she'd only driven it twice before—backing into a driveway (one I hadn't even noticed) to reverse direction, taking us all the way to Rodgerton Street and beyond.

"WAIT, that's Hollywood Park?"

I looked out the windshield as Sam pulled over on Canyon Lake Drive and killed the engine, which dieseled and rattled, briefly. "It's a park, what did you expect?"

Lazaro cupped his eyes, peering out the side window. "I don't know. Like, a statue of Marilyn Monroe; or somethin'. You know, with the wind all up in her shit and—"

“That’s Palm Springs,” said Nigel. “‘Forever Marilyn,’ on Museum Way. You’d like it.”

“How the fuck would you know what I’d like?”

“It’s an up-skirt. Just your speed.”

“Hey, fuck you, Jamaica. Why don’t you just—”

“Alright, knock it off, both of you,” I said. “Nigel, let’s have a look at that map.”

We all gathered around as Nigel spread it between himself and Sam.

“I’m afraid it hasn’t changed much,” he said. “There’s still no road other than Mount Lee Drive. And you saw the terrain; Gargantua can’t handle that.”

“What about on foot?” I circled a tangle of residential roads with my finger. “So we know these are blocked; what if we headed northeast straight from the park and just circumnavigated the whole mess?”

“Could work, but it would take time, and we don’t know what’s in those—”

“Hills, precisely,” interjected Mr. Fantastic. “Look, see these? All these peaks and valleys? It’s like a great big washboard, right? Well, see, that’s precisely the kind of terrain welterweights like Utahraptor and Phorusrhacos love, because it allows them to herd prey into the lowlands and trap it there.”

He looked at me gravely, solemnly. “In other words, we’d be walking straight into a kill box.”

I sat back in my seat and exhaled, wondering why Roman had put me in charge in the first place, why I’d accepted. Why I’d made the decisions I’d made. Why we’d come over a thousand miles on such a fool’s errand. What I was going to tell the others back in Issaquah ...

“If we could ... if we could just move faster, maybe,” I said. “Get there before anything could triangulate us.”

Mr. Fantastic only shook his head. “No, man. No. You’re smarter than that. Turn us around, Jamie. Turn us around ... and let’s go home.”

I took off my glasses and rubbed the bridge of my nose.

At length Sam said, "I can drive—if you're not up to it. I don't mind, really."

I must have nodded. All I remember for certain is hearing the engine start and Lazaro grumbling before Nigel said, unexpectedly, "Wait a minute. Wait a minute. The Ranch."

"Forget it," I said—irritably. I didn't want to hear it, whatever it was.

"Holy shit, I forgot all about it." I heard the map rattle as he tapped it. "The Ranch. The Ranch, mon, Sunset Ranch."

Lazaro cursed as he swiveled in his chair. "What the fuck are you even—"

"What do mean, 'Sunset Ranch?'" I glanced at the map and quickly back to him. "Talk to me, dammit!"

He only shrugged, carelessly, nonchalantly. "It—it's a tourist attraction, sort of a barbeque joint, but with a riding stable and a corral full of horses. It's right here." He indicated a spot on the map. "Yuh, see, there's even a trail, here, which intersects with Mount Lee Drive."

"And follow that right into an ambush?" Mr. Fantastic harumphed.

"Horses," I muttered. "Holy Christ."

I slouched over the map and pointed. "If there's horses left alive we could follow the trail to Mount Lee Drive and then cross it—right here, then cut through the hills north by northwest until we come straight to the bunker." I looked at everyone one by one. "Not only that, but if we get attacked ... they'll go for the horses. Not us."

I tried to smile as Sam glowered at me. "More meat," I said, and shrugged.

The cockpit fell silent as everyone thought about it.

"I've never even rode a horse," said Mr. Fantastic. "How the hell am I going to—"

"You'll stay with Gargantua," I said. "And cover us with the .50 cal for as far as you can. How about the rest of you?"

"4-H Blue-ribbon, Poulsbo State Fair," said Sam. "2007."

"Used to ride 'em right there at Sunset," said Nigel, "when we were working for Eagleton."

I looked at Lazaro, who seemed to hesitate.

"Of course I've ridden a fucking horse," he grumbled. "I'm from Idaho." He added: "What about you?"

"Never in my life," I said, and looked at Sam—I don't know why. "But I'll manage. Don't worry about it."

I looked at Mr. Fantastic, who just shook his head.

"Okay ..." I breathed. I held my hand out to the others, palm down. "Who's in?"

And Sam slapped her hand over mine, after which Nigel slapped his hand over her's—and Lazaro topped us all off.

"Great," said Mr. Fantastic, disappointed. "All right ..." He picked up the targeting goggles. "Let's hope there's some horses."

And then we were off, making a U-turn in the middle of Canyon Lake Drive and rumbling toward Sunset Ranch—all of us, I think, wondering if we were really up to it, and if we could actually pull it off. All of us, I think, frightened out of our wits.

AS IT TURNED OUT, THERE were horses: fourteen of them, to be exact, all of which were healthy and had been well-maintained—thanks to a woman named Shawna, who lived at the Ranch. Nor had our meeting been a confrontational one, in part because she'd been riding out in the field when we'd first rumbled up and had hardly been in a position; but mostly because she was a woman of singular grace and beauty who wouldn't have hurt a fly—even if her life and wellbeing had depended on it. In this case, fortunately—it hadn't.

“Well now, if that isn’t a posse,” she said, and took the picture—even as our horses grew restless and mine most of all: nickering and neighing, clearly wanting to go. “The Apple Dumpling Gang rides again.”

She waited as the Instamatic developed the snapshot and pushed it out—humming in the silence, groaning as though its batteries were low. “Ah, see?”

She quickly approached and handed it to me. “That’ll be a buck ninety-eight.”

I took it but didn’t look at it yet, smiling down at her from “Rusty,” liking the way the sun fell on her face and hair. “Just add it to your Lifetime Protection Plan,” I said, and glanced at Gargantua. “You’re going to like having that parked here, I think.”

“If it means I’ll be seeing you again, I will,” she said, and beamed up at me, earnestly, unguardedly. She seemed to grow somber. “Take care of my horses, Jamie. Bring them back safe.”

I looked at the picture, which showed the four of us mounted in front of the trailhead, our rifles slung across our backs—and smiled. “I will do everything in my power, Shawna. I prom—” I left off, feeling as though a cold hand had gripped my heart. “Oh, no.” I looked from the picture to the trail.

“What is it?” Her previously lilting voice had lowered an octave. “What’s wrong?”

I gripped the reins, dropping the picture—even as Rusty whinnied and squirmed—wanting to reach back and unsling my rifle; wanting to have some kind of defense. But it was already too late; too late for fight or flight. Too late for anything but to hold perfectly still. “Shhh,” I whispered, “nobody move. And don’t reach for your weapons. Don’t even breathe.”

I indicated the trail—the horses snorting and shuffling about—even as Shawna followed my gaze, and gasped.

“Oh, my God.”

“Shhh ...”

We didn’t budge, didn’t blink, as the allosaur approached: its leg muscles working beneath black and pebbled skin; its blood-red crests gleaming (for, indeed, it appeared to be the same one we had encountered earlier in the day).

“No way, man,” moaned Lazaro—quietly, unsteadily. “No fucking—”

I waved him to silence even as Shawna worked the horses—stroking their manes, rubbing their snouts; trying to calm them—as I recalled something about horses and predators in the wild, something I’d read: which was that they didn’t fear predators so much as the act of predation—meaning, I suppose, that those who hadn’t encountered dinosaurs before (which these hadn’t, according to Shawna) would have no reason to fear them—unless, of course, they (the dinosaurs) behaved in a threatening way. Which, curiously, this one wasn’t doing.

I carefully reached behind me and pressed the emergency button on my radio. “Here’s where we find out if Mr. Fantastic is right ...”

I glanced at Shawna, who looked back at me questioningly.

“About their vision,” I said. “Predatory dinosaurs. About it being movement-based.”

To the others I mumbled: “I just alerted Mr. Fantastic; we gotta give him time. He’ll hear it and then arm the .50 cal. Just hang on. And keep your horses steady.”

“Here it comes,” said Sam, indicating the allosaur.

And it came—but did not attack; striding instead to a nearby trough (or rather a bathtub on blocks) and beginning to drink—deeply—before plopping down in a cloud of dust and beginning to yawn and stretch ... after which it laid its chin flat and just stared at us—as though we were friends. As though we were one big, happy family.

I exchanged glances with Shawna, who smiled earnestly, unguardedly, even as something whirred—Gargantua's .50 cal, which swiveled and lowered, training itself on the allosaur.

I shook my open palm, indicating he shouldn't fire.

"Shawna," I said—breathlessly, tensely—eyeing the animal carefully, "Walk back to your house. Don't be afraid. Just ... walk. Slowly. Non-threateningly. Go."

"Oh, my God, Jamie. But—"

"Do it," I said, feeling for my rifle, touching its wood stock. "We've got you covered." I gripped the weapon and brought it around—slowly, non-threateningly—saw Sam and the others doing the same. To them I said: "Don't fire unless I tell you to."

Lazaro harrumphed, sneering. "What should we do, then, introduce ourselves?"

I looked at the allosaur: at its golden eyes, which were entirely free of the glow—"the Color," as we often called it, the mysterious light by which we always knew an animal had been affected, been swayed, by them, by the Others—which seemed almost passive, meditative.

"Easy ... He's not a threat." I watched as Shawna went, cautiously, reluctantly—then motioned again to Gargantua.

Do not engage, I repeated, staring at its tinted windows. Hold your fire.

"This is ridiculous," cursed Lazaro, and pumped his long gun—slowly, smoothly, with hardly a sound. "Are we going to leave it? What—so it can come after us the moment it starts to feel hungry? Are you kidding?"

But I'd already decided; the allosaur would be spared.

We weren't going to butcher it—even if it meant facing it later, and increasing our risk. Because it was important, somehow—keeping it alive. It was ... I can't explain it, not really—I couldn't then and I can't now. I just knew that we couldn't kill it. That it—had a purpose, somehow. A mission. Just as we.

“That’s exactly what we’re going to do,” I said, and patted Rusty’s shank, encouraging him forward. “Now let’s move.”

And we moved, trotting up the orangish-tan clay like Chieftains, like a posse, our rifles in one hand and the reins in the other (the allosaur closing its eyes and seeming to doze as Gargantua’s cannon hummed and realigned, following us as we went), Shawna watching safely from her window.

IT WAS AT ONCE GARISH and sublime, hipster and gauche, a burnt-orange relic of a bygone era with a tip of the hat to Frank Lloyd Wright and a debt to Google architecture—a thing as righteous as it was ridiculous, which sat amongst its desert like an outsider, an intruder, as out of place as the transplanted palms and piped-in water, as artificial as L.A. itself.

“They weren’t kidding when they called it the Lost Aztec Temple of Mars,” I said, as Rusty fidgeted and nickered, and shook flies from his ears. “But what’s with all the high fencing and concertina wire—only to leave the entire front-perimeter open? There’s just a hedgerow. No fence at all.”

Nigel sat up in his saddle and looked on, the sweat beading along his forehead. “Be damned if I know; it wasn’t like that before.” He looked around the area—skittishly, I thought. “Maybe he had it removed when they took out the road. He was like that, you know. All about the visual.” He pointed at the house itself. “Wouldn’t have been a problem, though, even if it were there—there’s a man door in the fence just beyond that breezeway.”

I held out my arm as everyone started to move. “I—hold up. I—ah, I don’t like this.”

I scanned the overgrown yard and the cosmetically-placed boulders (some of which were the size of moving vans); looking for traps, looking for threats. “It doesn’t feel right.”

Lazaro got off his horse and approached the hedgerow—then turned to face us, splaying his arms. “What? You heard Jamaica; dude was all about the visual. Probably figured there was no need—once the road was taken out. For a front fence, I mean.” He let his arms slap to his sides. “Now are we going to go check it out, or what? Or are you all just going to sit there all day?”

And there was a growling noise, a deep-throated snarl, which sounded from behind one of the rocks even as a shadow fell across the knee-high grass—at which a great cat padded out which was easily the size of a pickup, and hissed at us: its huge pallet showing pink and pale, its black lips stretching, its whiskers and curved fangs—which were like tusks—gleaming in the sun.

“Lazaro, don’t!”

But it was too late; he’d already drawn his pistol and squeezed off a few rounds—which went pop, pop, pop in the late afternoon sun and echoed along the hills; which reverberated across the valley like the sound of a car backfiring.

“Goddammit, man,” I cursed, even as my horse and everyone else’s leapt up in a panic and started to bolt; as Lazaro’s trotted into the scrub and didn’t look back, as the saber-toothed cat advanced several yards toward us—and stopped.

“You—you just let that entire army know we’re still here; and exactly where we’re at,” I snapped, having wrestled my horse back around along with everyone else (although Nigel was still struggling), and finally climbed off, tossing the reins into the scrub. I looked at the cat, the Smilodon, which paced back and forth furiously. “Now just back away, slowly. And hold your fire. It’s not advancing. Come on!”

But he didn’t; back away, that is—all least not right away; choosing instead to creep closer ... advancing several feet before pausing in front of the hedgerow and leaning forward—looking down.

“Yo, Jamie! You got to see this!” He turned to face us, his face lit up like a child’s. “Come on! It’s completely safe.”

I looked at Sam, who got off her horse and looked back at me—tentatively, hesitantly. And then we moved forward, Nigel having gained control of his steed and dismounted and quickly run up to join us.

“It’s a moat,” said Lazaro, “like the kind they have at Woodland Park. Check it out.”

I looked into its depths, amazed at its cleverness and ingenuity; at its ability to follow form with function.

“A perfect illusion,” I said, shaking my head, and added: “Leave it to a sci-fi writer, I guess. To come up with something like this.” I peered through the breezeway at the house, which seemed wide open to us now. “My friends ... it is time.”

I looked at the others and then to Sandahl—to Sam. “Let’s go check out the world’s most well-appointed basement, shall we?”

“It’s more than that,” she said, and beamed; our beautiful and only female (in the away team, that is, since we’d lost Joan); our very own Heather Locklear. “It’s home.”

And then there was a burst of gunfire and she fell—just slouched face-first into the dirt; and we all followed the sound to the Hollywood sign where an array of trucks had fanned out above and behind it—all along the ridge—trucks with blue and white flags flying from their beds.

After which we scooped Sam up by her armpits and scrambled for the nearest rock formation: where Nigel and Lazaro began shooting back while I leaned over Sam and the blood poured from her mouth and down her cheeks. Where it trickled into the orangish-tan clay even as she looked up at me—trying but failing to form words; trying to tell me something but wholly unable—and pooled around her head like dark, red wine.

“JESUS, JAMIE, look.”

It was Nigel—catching his breath with his back to the rocks, peering beyond the hedgerow. I followed his gaze to where the cat had begun backing up—crouched low like a puma, swinging its hindquarters. Focused on us like a laser beam.

“Jesus, shoot it!” I snapped, cradling Sam’s head in my arms, unable to do it myself. “Hurry, before it—”

But it was too late—the Smilodon had already launched itself at the moat: clearing it but only barely, snatching the hedgerow in its forepaws, fighting its way up and over.

And then we were pinned: Nigel and Lazaro firing at the Tucker train as I cradled Sam and the Smilodon approached; as the Communications Center exploded and there was a tremendous fireball—which rose, curling, into the clear, blue sky—as the cat hunkered down yet again (as if to pounce) but was disrupted by a hiss and a snarl from behind me; from behind the rock formation, at which the black allosaur stalked out and crouched low—its foreclaws splayed, its eyes rolling back in its skull—and launched itself at the cat—like a cobra, almost, or a barracuda—the force of it spinning the tiger in the dust and pushing it onto its back, where it thrashed and snapped its teeth—but quickly rebounded.

I snatched up my radio and toggled it: “Gargantua One this is Mobile, do you copy?”

Sam stirred as I waited, reaching up and touching my face, trying desperately to speak, as guns crackled all around us.

“Gargantua, go ahead.”

“Listen up: We are pinned down at the bunker and are taking heavy fire. I need you to double-time it back to the gate and engage those targets. Engage them—and then move right up the road, all the way to the Communications Center. Use your smoke screen; it’ll disorient them. But you need you to hit ‘em with everything you got, understand? Gargantua. Do you copy?”

I heard it across the hills even before he acknowledged: the rapid-fire of Gargantua's Gatling gun—tearing up targets, hopefully taking out the missile operator.

The radio hissed and squelched. “I heard it and I am already there, and engaging,” said Mr. Fantastic. “Stand by.”

I put my hand over Sam's own and held it against my cheek, holding her as tight as I could, rocking her gently. “Hang in there, kiddo. We're going to get you to that medical bay, you just wait and see. But you've got to hang in there.”

I watched as the animals spun around in a deathmatch, kicking up orange dust, causing clouds of it to overtake us, growling and gnashing their teeth.

“It's no good, mon,” said Nigel. “I'm down to my last clip.”

“Here,” said Lazaro, and tossed him a fresh one. “I brought extra.”

But Nigel was right: We weren't going to last, much less get Sam to a medical bay—not the one in Gargantua and not the one in the bunker. I just didn't see it happening before—

Before—

And there was a sound, very faint at first but growing, intensifying, coming closer. Getting louder—and I mean exponentially. Chopping the air like a string of firecrackers, like a machete, seeming to eclipse everything as a shadow passed over the ground and I peered skyward—following the thing as it briefly blotted the sun, tracking it as it pounded toward the Hollywood sign.

A helicopter. An Apache. The most beautiful thing I had ever seen, before or since. Our own Roman Malone—Black Stringfellow Hawke, as he jokingly referred to himself (in deference to Mr. Fantastic and that old TV show, Airwolf). Our Eye in the Sky—who had gone into Fort Lewis and come out with a tiger in his pocket. Who had somehow managed the impossible and brought it all the way here—to save us in our most desperate hour; to save Sam before she bled out.

“Well hello down there,” came his familiar voice over the radio—followed by a loud burst of static, which crackled and popped. “Looks like you’ve made some friends here already ...”

I watched as he circled the mountain: being a good Eye in the Sky, taking in the lay of the land. “Is that something I might be of assistance with? We got rockets.”

“Hot-damn, that crazy bastard did it,” shouted Lazaro—gripping Nigel’s shoulder, giving it a shake. “Flyboy comes through again!” He howled at the sky.

“We’re the posse that can’t be stopped, man,” said Nigel, and gripped him back. “The Issaquah Five has struck again. Can you believe it, James? I mean, can you—”

But I wasn’t looking at him anymore, Sam’s hand having relaxed and slid slowly from my cheek, her head having slumped, heavily, it seemed, deeper into my arms.

“Is she—?” began Nigel, as Lazaro grimaced.

“Fuck no, man ...”

But she was gone, and there was nothing else to say.

Nothing else to do.

I lowered her to the dirt—slowly, gingerly—as small arms continued to rattle and pop. Nor did I notice the absence of combat from the animals—although, looking back, it must surely have been over. Nobody said anything for several moments.

At last my radio squelched. “Jamie, this is Gargantua—and the road has been cleared ... to within about a quarter mile of the Communications Center. I can see it from my location. Thing is, that Apache’s got them seriously spooked, and they seem to be heading out ... heading this way. What do you want me to do, over.”

But I just remained slumped over Sam, feeling responsible for it—all of it—feeling as though I’d failed her. Feeling as though I was to blame.

“Second that, Jamie,” came Roman, followed by another burst of static. “We got them in a pincer, a real kill box. This is your call.”

I looked at Nigel and Lazaro, my eyes brimming with tears.

“We’ll have to deal with them eventually, Jamie,” said Nigel—softly. “I think you know that as well as I do.”

I must have focused on Lazaro, who said, “Take it from someone who knows them. They’ll be back.”

At last I toggled the mic: “Sam is dead,” I said, and gave it a moment to sink in. “So here’s what we’re going to do. Mr. Fantastic, I want you to hold the line and prevent any of them from escaping, okay?” I waited for him to acknowledge. “But it’s going to fall on you, Roman, to neutralize them. Because they’re too dangerous to leave standing. Just ... use everything you have. There’s no children. There are, however, woman and young people. It—it’s a tribe, you understand Like ours. But—they’ve made it clear: we’re not welcome. Nobody is. Under penalty of execution. And they’ve claimed all of Hollywood.” I looked at Sandahl’s lithe, crumpled form. “And, well ... they killed Sam.”

I lowered the radio and stood, now that the firing had stopped, and looked at the ridge, where the Tucker trucks were evacuating. “This one’s for you, Sam.” Then I raised it again. “Play something for her, would you, Gargantua? The Randy Newman album. And pipe it over the loudspeakers so we can hear it. Otherwise ... fire when ready.”

And then we waited, watching the trucks with their billowing flags slowly move along the ridge, watching them go.

Last night I saw Lester Maddox on a TV show / With some smart-ass New York Jew / The Jew laughed at Lester Maddox / And the audience laughed at Lester Maddox too ...

I heard gunshots—nothing major, just some idiot in the Tucker train shooting at the sky.

So I went to the park and I took some paper along / And that’s where I made this song ...

And then it started, the Apache firing two Hellfire missiles which hit a group of pickups at the start of the train and instantly blew them to pieces, glass and shrapnel flying, a body tumbling in the air.

We talk real funny down here / We drink too much, we laugh too loud / We're too dumb to make it in no northern town ...

Two more missiles fired, this time at the other end of the train, blowing pickups and blue flags into the air, sending a cab higher than anything else—like the turrets of those Iraqi tanks in the first Gulf War—hurling a Rugged Terrain tire along the ridge, which eventually rolled down the hill.

We're keeping the niggers down ...

More missiles, like scaled-up bottle rockets: hitting the column like hammers, making fireballs of King Cabs and beds of people; spitting from the chopper's hardpoints like fireworks, like flairs, incinerating skin and catching hair on fire, I knew, and didn't care, obliterating pennants and banners.

We're rednecks, we're rednecks / We don't know our ass from a hole in the ground ...

Until he'd finally fired everything: Hellfires and Hydras, Stingers and Spikes, all of them hissing and screaming, finding their targets; all of them lighting the ridge up like the Fourth of July, or maybe the volcano at The Mirage, in Las Vegas, each making our world safer and saner and more secure—more righteous, more lost.

Each bringing smoke and silence and peace—like the lights in the sky themselves—to the war-torn hills of Earth.

BY THE TIME ROMAN HAD finished mopping up and landed the Apache, we'd covered Sam with a tarp from Gargantua (Mr. Fantastic had parked it next to the Hollywood sign) and I'd closed the allosaur's eyes—having said a prayer for him first in appreciation of his sacrifice (for he'd surely saved us from the saber-toothed cat, which also lay dead) and even piled stones.

"I don't know why he took to us like that," said Lazaro, walking over to join me, "but I'm sure glad he did."

We looked down at the beast as the sun continued to sink and everything took on a golden hue.

"You were right, you know. About not killing him." He looked at me as the breeze tousled his hair. "And I'm sorry."

I stared at the allosaur, which looked oddly at rest, oddly peaceful, and thought about Sam. "Yeah. Well. I was wrong about a lot of things too."

I looked up to see Roman walking toward us across the scrub. "If that look means what I think it does you can knock it off, right now," he said, and paused. "We all knew the danger; Sam perhaps most of all. She died doing what she believed." He looked at the allosaur and then to me. "Don't take that away from her."

I rested my hand on his shoulder. "Nor you, Roman?"

He straightened suddenly and looked me in the eye. "Nor me. We both did exactly what we had to do." He gripped my shoulder and shook it slightly. "It wasn't the first time, as you'll recall. And it won't be ..."

I must have squinted at him. "What? What is it?"

But he only stared beyond me—toward the bunker, toward the breezeway, at which I turned around and saw an old man creeping toward us holding a shotgun: a man as bloated and pale, as unhealthy, as I had ever seen; a man in silk pajamas and a monogrammed bathrobe, who's dark hair was parted as if with a knife and who wore yellow-tinted glasses through which you could clearly see his eyes—a man I instantly recognized as Hugo Eagleton.

"Take off your weapons," he said, continuing to approach, "All of you. Right now."

But nobody did, only moved back slowly to give him space—holding their arms at their sides, ready for anything.

“I’ll fill you full of shot, don’t think I won’t. Now drop ‘em. Now.” He hurried toward me suddenly, I have no idea why, and stuck the shotgun in my chest. “Who’s in charge here? Huh? Is it you, you bespectacled little shit? Answer me!”

“It—it is,” I said, sensing everyone stirring, and added, “Everybody just chill, okay? I’m all right.”

He used the double barrels to raise my chin. “I’ll be the judge of that. Now, listen. I want you to say something—all right? I want you to prove to me you’re human. Got it? It can be anything; a quote from a book, a humorous aphorism, a dirty joke; hell, we can have a Socratic dialogue, for all I care. Just entertain and enlighten me; prove to me you’re human and not one of these animals wandering the city like a saw-boned coyote—just looking for something to eat. Or fuck. And make it snappy, yeah? ‘Brevity is the soul of wit,’ they say. I don’t have time to dawdle—one look at me should tell you that.” He pushed the shotgun hard against my throat. “And go. You’re the Oracle at Delphi.”

I rolled my eyes, looking around. “Nobody try anything, all right? I—I got this. I think.” I took a deep breath and exhaled. “Okay. Fine.” I cleared my throat. “The Dreaming City ... by Hugo Eagleton. Chapter One, paragraph one.” I paused to collect my thoughts. ‘It ... it was the first night of the Sacrificium, a night of sacrifice and death, a night when the black coins tendered in the Lottery would be tendered back. B-but it ... it was also the Hora Mil—Mille Semitis, the Hour of a Thousand paths, for that is the day the Sacrificium had fallen on this year, an hour when best friends might become enemies, when lovers of longstanding might betray oaths, in which anything and everything was possible. A night—in other words—for dreaming; but also for something else. Something elusive but impossible to ignore—nebulous—but as real as the River Dire; and which seemed to have stolen into the world on the wind itself ...’

I opened my eyes—having closed them in order to concentrate—and saw that he was crying. Weeping.

“Bullocks, of course,” he said, finally, and lowered the shotgun. “Pure, undiluted bullocks—as stupid and naïve as the young man who wrote it.”

He let the weapon fall to his side. “Ah, well. Such are the things men busy themselves with.” He cocked his head as though thinking of something, as though it were standing right in front of him, whatever it was. “And yet the thing is, I can still remember when I wrote that. Isn’t that the damndest thing? It was in that first shithole apartment in New York, the one in Flatbush, Brooklyn.” He smiled a little, thinking about it. “Susan was there, still young, still beautiful, but had long since fallen asleep. I was wearing comfortable shoes—funny I should remember that—and I’d eaten not long before. Nothing fancy, just—food that fit my stomach. And there was a good dog; Bruno, a Bull Terrier, laying right at my feet. And that part—that part was not bullocks. That part—well, it’s what I should have been writing about, isn’t it?”

He looked at me somberly, lucidly. “You’re here for the bunker ... aren’t you?”

I just nodded, slowly, firmly.

“And if I don’t freely give it, I suppose you’ll take it—isn’t that about right? That about it?”

I nodded again, slowly.

He looked at the dead; at the allosaur and the Smilodon, which must have been some sort of pet, and poor Sam, with one foot sticking out of her tarp.

“Is this all of you? Just you five? There’s no women? No kids?”

“There’s 28—27—of us ... in total,” I said. “Got a settlement in Isaquah ... that’s in Washington State, at an old drive-in theater. It’s been good, but ... we’re running out of things. Out of supplies. And it’s getting harder and harder to make excursions into the city, into Seattle. It, ah, it gets more treacherous every day. We ... we've lost a lot of good people."

He seemed to think about that, scratching at his stubble. He leaned forward abruptly. "There's food enough here to last a decade," he said, conspiratorially. "Maybe longer. Not to mention the hydroponics, and a modest medical facility. There's even a bowling alley."

"We'd love to see it," I said. I looked at Sam. "But I don't want to leave her like that. Do you have a shovel—or a spade? Maybe some blankets? Or a pillow?"

He reached up and gripped my shoulder—the dude was definitely short—gave it a little shake.

"Son, we'll give your friend all the honors she deserves, and more, or my name isn't Hugo Eagleton." He slapped my arm harder than was necessary. "You just follow old Uncle Hugo to the shed."

And then we went, Lazaro, Nigel, Mr. Fantastic, Roman, and I, through the orange breezeway and into the back yard—which was populated with stone beasts—into his private world; which he'd decided to share.

Needed to share, I'm certain.

end.

The Flashback will continue in the next installment of The Lost Country ...

If you enjoyed this work of fiction, please consider leaving a review at your point of sale. Thanks!

Other Tales from
The Flashback

The Big Empty

PHOTOGRAPHERS CALL it the golden hour, that period of time right before sunset when the sky glows orange and the shadows lose their edges, and the world becomes, for the space of about 20 minutes, something elevated and painterly—ephemeral, even sublime. Add to that the ocean breaking over the rocks and the black and white 19th century lighthouse, and, well, you have some idea of how seeing Granite Point that first time affected us (when we were taking it all in by Jeep, whose top we'd removed in spite of the pterodactyls swarming the beach). So, too, were there the strange lights in the sky, which peered down, relentlessly, disapprovingly, as though we had no right to even celebrate (by going on what Amelia had called our “post-apocalyptic honeymoon”), nor to end our crushing isolation.

Beyond that, though, beyond the fact that it was the golden hour and the waves were crashing and that one side of the lighthouse gleamed like polished brass (or that we were still euphoric over having encountered each other less than 24 hours before), beyond all that was our shared epiphany; which was that the lantern, far from being illuminated from without, was, now that we'd had a chance to observe it up close, shining from within. That it had somehow been kept on—either by electricity or gas or the burning of oil or kerosene—and that it would have had to have been carefully maintained. Which meant that someone, somehow, someone just like us, perhaps, had managed to survive.

“It’s beautiful,” said Amelia—and swallowed, batting away the tears. “My God, Francis. Look at it. I never thought—”

“That you’d see a light again, I know.” I peered at the house attached to the tower’s base and the old truck parked in its drive—which looked to be in surprisingly good shape. “Nor did I.” I looked at her sidelong and gave her a little wink. “But then, I didn’t expect you, either.”

She didn’t notice, only continued staring at the lantern house, as if she were in a daze. “It shifts ... the light. First white, then blue, then purple. And then a color—sort of like bottle green, only iridescent. Like a mallard’s neck. And yet shot through with ...”

She looked at me as if for help.

“Beats me,” I said. “I’m color blind. Red-green color deficiency. Either way, I suggest we make contact—if we’re going to. It’ll be too dangerous after dark.”

She seemed to come out of it, whatever it was. “Is that a good idea? I mean, with just our knives?”

“No,” I said, studying the darkened house. “But—whoever they are—they’re using something for power.” I lifted my gaze to the rotating lamp. “Enough to turn and illuminate that thing. And I’d like to know what it is.” I looked at her across the cab, which was bathed in golden light. “Wouldn’t you?”

And we just stared at each other: there by the lighthouse at Granite Point on the Oregon coast, after the time-storm—the Flashback, as someone had called it at the beginning—the dinosaur apocalypse. After everyone had vanished and the entire world had become a landscape of cycads and ruins, a place inhabited by winds and the souls of winds, a lost country.

“JESUS. JUST—Jesus,” said Amelia, staring at the decomposing body. “How long do you think it’s been here?”

I examined it where it was sprawled on the back porch, facing the ocean, its skin blackened and clinging to the bones—like it had been vacuum sealed—its wispy hair fluttering. “Hard to say. Few weeks. Maybe a month.” I batted away the flies. “Long enough for the organs to liquify.”

“How—how do you know?”

I studied the holes in its head, a smaller one which was about the size of a dime and a larger, more cavernous one—the exit wound. “Because, otherwise, there’d be brains all over.” I stepped over it and picked up the gun, checked its chamber. “There’s still bullets in it.”

She stared at me tentatively as I closed the chamber and gripped the weapon in both hands—neither of us saying anything. At last I nodded to the back door—the screen of which banged back and forth in the wind—and tried to brace myself. “You ready?”

She shook her head.

“Let’s go,” I said.

And then she was holding the screen as I inched forward and gripped the knob—turning it slowly, carefully, easing the door open. Stepping into a room which was dark as pitch; which reeked of cat piss and despair.

WE WORKED WELL TOGETHER, that much was clear; it was evidenced by how we swept and cleared the house so efficiently, Amelia opening the curtains (to let in more light) even as I scrambled to quick-check the rooms and closet spaces—finding a radio with batteries in it as well as some flashlights; not to mention a pantry full of food (mainly jars and jars of canned fish—salmon and snapper, according to the labels). Still, what I didn’t find was any evidence of a non-electric power source for the lantern; something which seemed impossible—given the grid had failed shortly after the Flashback and the house itself was completely inert. Nor would this have gone unexamined—that is, if not for the discovery of the door; by which I mean the padlocked door to the tower itself, which we stumbled across at virtually the same instant—or so it seemed—having found it tucked away in a kind of antechamber in the furthestmost section of the home.

“But, why the hell would he lock it?” I confess I was flummoxed.

Amelia frowned. "Why wouldn't he? He probably felt as though he were the only one that—I don't know, could be trusted with it. To maintain it. Especially after the Flashback." She fingered a small hook next to the door. "That's odd—don't you think?"

I stared at the hook. It was the only thing that wasn't.

"It's probably on that corpse; the key, I mean."

She looked up at me fetchingly, her brown eyes—she said they were green—flicking up and down my body, once, twice.

"Now wait just a damn minute,"

"Now you wouldn't promise me a lighthouse and then fail to deliver, would you?" She ran her hands over my shirt and up the sides of my neck, cupping my face in her palms, tilting her head. "I mean, we are on our honeymoon—aren't we? And who knows what a girl might do if escorted to the top of that beautiful beacon with the waves crashing all around her and the seabirds—"

"Pterodactyls," I corrected her. "They're pterodactyls. And they'll peck your eyes out."

"Whatever," she rasped, and brushed my lips with her own. "What are you afraid of? That you'll catch the Ebola virus? Or maybe smallpox? The 1918 flu?"

"What I'm afraid of," I lowered her hands gently. "Is that we're going to lose the light and get stuck here. Like, all night." I looked at her sternly. "And I don't think you want that."

She picked at and adjusted my shirt collar, undeterred. "Why not? I mean, where else should we go? Back to Walmart? Back to those little settees in Home Furnishings, with their hard, hard little cushions—where you were such a gentleman, I might add, to just talk to me and assuage my doubts, and to not try so much as a—"

There was a sound, a kind of warbling yowl, a drawn-out, caterwauling, doleful cry, which rose up from the nearby trees and reverberated along the shoreline—where it was promptly answered by another, and yet another.

Neither of us moved.

At last I said: "That was a pit raptor."

Nobody said anything as the waves crashed against the rocks and the pterodactyls squawked.

"Out on the point? That's impossible."

"No, it's not. They're night hunters. They're just beginning their workday."

"But—"

"Shhh. Listen."

The sound came again—briefer, this time, more succinct, as though the animal was moving.

I looked around the room—my heart pounding, but there were no windows, no way to tell what was going on outside. "We've got to go. Like, now. Before—"

"But, don't you see? That's what I was trying to tell you. We took the top down."

I froze, feeling as though the walls were closing in—like I might actually pass out. But then—then it just passed, I can't really explain it, and I was myself again (the "cool cucumber," as Amelia had described me), and what's more, I'd accepted it. Accepted that I had led us blundering into a bad situation because I had hoped, in some dim quarter of my mind—and this despite it being the end of the world itself—to make time with her.

Amelia. The girl I'd met in a ruined Walmart in Coos Bay while scrounging for a pair of shoes—again, while the sun was going down—as well as something to eat. I guess one didn't know whether to laugh or to cry. Either way, one thing had become clear. And that was that, for this night, anyway—we weren't going anywhere.

NOW, YOU MIGHT ASK: Didn't I find it odd that she'd be so adamant on sleeping separately—in spite of the cold and her earlier flirtatiousness—that we had to drag a bed into the antechamber? And my answer is: No. Not really. Rather, I just took it to mean she was establishing a boundary, and that the apocalypse itself couldn't turn her into something she wasn't—which, frankly, I respected. Besides, any man who knows anything knows the coin paid going in is the same earned staying out, which is to say Time, however scrambled it had become, was on my side, and I knew it.

More than any of that, though, was that I wanted to try out the radio, which I did, drinking scotch from the caretaker's stash and looking out the window—which framed the breakers and gathered pterodactyls like a picture—wrapped in one of the keeper's thick, filthy blankets. At which I was delighted to discover that the batteries were good and that it in fact worked— and so began scrubbing the dial; hoping, against hope, to catch something, anything (an emergency broadcast signal, a test tone, anything) but finding only static; until, suddenly, even as I was about to give up, there were a flurry of sounds—sounds such as I hadn't heard since before the Flashback—which, taken together, constituted a thing I'd thought no longer possible, a thing as extinct as the terrible lizards themselves, which I turned down immediately in order to keep all to myself, and soaked up as though fresh from the desert—marinating in it, breathing it all in, drowning.

Woah, Georgia ... Geoorrkia ... No peace, no peace I find. Just an old, sweet song, keeps Georgia, on my miiind

I think I must have sunk to the floor, sunk to it in a veritable puddle, spilling the bottle of scotch which clinked and sloshed, forgetting about the cold and the lantern and the pit raptors—which may or may not have still been out there—forgetting the lost country and its hopelessness.

I said just an old, sweet song, keeps Georgia ... on my miiind ...

Until it was over, and the instruments and back-up singers had all faded to nothing, and a voice came on—a new voice, a speaking voice; a woman's voice—and said, mellifluously, “And that was the immortal Ray Charles, with “Georgia on my Mind.” And this—this is Radio Free Montana—with Bella Ray, broadcasting from Barley Hot Springs in what some used to call the Great White North—which was not intended as a compliment.” She laughed. “So just trust in God and keep your powder dry; and stay with us here wherever you may be—whether that’s a cold water flat in Devil’s Lake, North Dakota, or a high-rise hotel in Miami-Dade—wherever you are out there in the Big Empty, we here at KAAR-RFM will try to have your back. And now it’s back to the music and Patsy Cline, with “Walking After Midnight.” Take it away, Patsy!”

I was up and moving down the hall almost before I’d realized it, double-timing it for Amelia’s room, using one of the flashlights I’d found to see the way, knocking on her door (which seemed thick as a vault now that I thought about it and just sort of absorbed the sound, like solid rock).

Jesus, I remember thinking. I’d searched for a mere signal and found a whole community! It was like we’d gotten rescued from Gilligan’s Island; escaped from the Land of the Lost. Like we’d come home from Oz itself. And I simply couldn’t wait to tell her— although how the music hadn’t awakened her was completely beyond me. I mean, surely—

But she didn’t answer the door, which seemed impossible, not even when I pounded on it with my fists, which literally shook off paint peelings. “Amelia!” I shouted. “Amelia!” I pounded again and again. “Wake up, Amelia!”

Until at last I thought, Fuck this, and tried the knob—only to find it locked. At which I resolved to kick it in (fat chance), or find an ax (she could be dying in there!), and was backing away from it to try just that, when it occurred to me I was acting like a psychopath and a fool.

The fact was, she was a heavy sleeper, I’d seen it myself the previous night. And she was in the habit of wrapping the pillow about her head, which would have further blunted any sound. And that door—Jesus Christ.

I wandered back into the living room and turned off the radio, to conserve the batteries. It would just have to wait until morning, like digging the key out of the corpse's pocket. The fact was—everything was going to be all right. And with that I found another bottle of liquor—Jeppson's Malört, whatever the fuck that was—and settled in on the couch; after which the grandfather clock struck 8 and what looked a plesiosaur, only huge, like a small whale, leapt from the ocean—to snatch one of the pterodactyls from the orange-painted rocks.

“WHAT, YOU’VE NEVER wondered if you dreamt something or actually experienced it? Happens to me. And you said it yourself: you were shit-canned off that—what was it?”

“Jeppson's Malört,” I said—still tasting it in my mouth, smelling it on my sweat. Still feeling as though it had been poured over my brain like bile. “Look, it wasn't a dream, okay?”

I stopped walking and stared at her—to emphasize my point—as seabirds swirled (there were no pterodactyls today) and the waves crashed. “Look, I know it's hard to believe, but I'm telling you: Someone is on the air.” I gripped her shoulders—harder than I'd intended. “Radio Free Montana—that's what they call themselves. Broadcasting out of a place called Barley Hot Springs. Jesus, Amelia. Don't you see what that means?”

She placed her hands on her hips. “Have you listened to yourself?” She briefly put her face in her palm. “How would a signal even get from there to here, without—I don't know, a relay of some kind. What you're saying is crazy, Francis—can't you see that?” She shook her head as if in pity. “I mean, can't you?”

“I'm not crazy,” I said, and took my hands off her. “I heard what I heard. And we've got to go there—like, now, today. While the sun is shining. I swear, I'll—" I looked back at the lighthouse and the old truck parked near our Jeep. "I'll go alone if I have to."

She picked up a couple pieces of driftwood, first one, then the other, looking exasperated. "Then why aren't they broadcasting anymore? Riddle me that, Francis. And why aren't you gathering wood for the fire? For that matter; why aren't you burying our friend?"

"There's maggots," I said—and started walking, finding it strange she hadn't mentioned the key. "I'm working up to it. And to hell with the fire. You're just trying to change the subject."

"Oh, I see. Well—isn't that what we came out here for? To gather wood?" She hurried to catch up with me. "Or would you prefer to freeze again tonight? You know: and to pickle yourself in Jeppson's Merlot, like—"

"Malört," I said, increasing my pace. "Besides, I don't plan on being here. And neither should you."

She stopped abruptly and called after me, "Then where are you going?"

I took a few more steps and then paused—but didn't turn around. "I was just walking—if you want to know the truth. Figured it would do us some good. But now—now I want to look at that." And I pointed.

At the beach grasses which had been singed and lain down nearly flat—as if a burning helicopter had set down directly in their midst—and the saltbushes twisted into an insidious vortex. At the mounds and mounds of sand and other sediment which had been dredged up and redeposited—in an approximate circle—by some presently unseen force (a bulldozer, perhaps); or an object from space having made sudden, violent impact.

"WHAT DO YOU SUPPOSE it was?" asked Amelia, poking the ashy dirt with one of her sticks, stirring it around.

"I wouldn't do that," I warned. "Could be unexploded ordinance—you never know."

She gasped and moved back—although not very far—as I studied the point of impact, noting how angular it was, how geometrical (as if a giant arrowhead had been stabbed into the earth); all of which left me to wonder—had the object somehow been removed? Or was it still down there?

I scanned the area, looking for debris. "There's no wreckage—which is odd. So I doubt it was a satellite. No; I'm afraid there's only two possibilities, really. Bomb or meteorite. And I doubt very much it was a bomb."

"Or is?"

"Or is."

She didn't say anything, only continued staring into the dirt.

At last I said, "What is it?"

"Nothing ... it ... it's nothing." She seemed dazed, confused. "It's just that ... it all seems so strange now. I mean—that we ever had use for such things. For bombs. That we could spend so much time and effort and money ... just to kill each other."

She looked out at the ocean and the billowing clouds, the whirling seabirds, the distant pterodactyls. "That we could make such ugliness and pain—such sheer terror—and in such a beautiful world. I mean, look at it, Francis. Can you honestly say that it's not better off without us? Or that, even if there are other people, we're not better off without them?"

I must have looked confused. "What the hell are you talking about?"

She turned to face me; her dark eyes close to mine. "Give me one reason, Francis. Give me one reason why we shouldn't just stay here, forever—you and I, alone. Give me one reason why we shouldn't restore the lighthouse and defend it and kill anyone who comes close; why we shouldn't go so far as to kill them first—just kill them where they sleep—and stop the threat before it even begins. Tell me now why they're worth saving, and why we shouldn't finish what they started," She nodded briskly at the sky, "What they instigated with the Flash-back but failed to complete. What can be completed still—"

And I kissed her, suddenly, completely—I'm still not sure why, maybe because I thought she was breaking down and that doing so would be the only way to snap her out of it, to shock her back to her senses. All I know is that she responded almost immediately and we stayed like that for some time, kissing not as children lost in a storm—which is how it had felt that first night when she'd pecked me on the lips before retreating to her own settee—but as something akin to red hot lovers: thirstily, intensely, primally (but not base), the Bogie and Bacall of the apocalypse.

After which I said, "Maybe you shouldn't be alone tonight."

And she said: "Not yet." And then kissed me again.

Until the moment (and the day) had passed and we'd agreed to stay one more night, and she'd retired by 8 pm to the antechamber while I drank vodka on the couch, shortly after which a plesiosaur breached the froth like a glistening killer whale—and snatched a pterodactyl from the orange-painted rocks.

I'M NOT GOING TO LIE; I hadn't really expected to find it—the key—regardless of what I'd expressed previously; so, imagine my surprise when I searched the corpse's stained pockets—managing, somehow, to keep a tenuous grasp on my breakfast—and touched a crenulated edge.

Bingo, I remember thinking, not lastly because it seemed to absolve Amelia—whom I'd come to suspect had taken it and not told me—but also because it would allow me to test something; something I'd been thinking about a lot since discovering the strange crater. One of many things I'd been thinking about.

I peered up at the lantern as the rain fell and the clouds drifted, as the melancholy of the day hung over everything like a shroud. Tell me now why humanity is worth saving, and why we shouldn't finish what They started. What They instigated with the Flashback but failed to complete. What can be completed still.

The words sat on my stomach like poached eggs. Absolved her? Perhaps. But not explained anything.

I gazed along the beach: at the desolate breakers and the gray tide rolling in, at the vortex of saltbushes about a half mile away—flies buzzing my face as I did so. I wasn't ready for this shit. For burying the lighthouse keeper. Then I started walking (wondering, as I went, what the weather was like in Montana, and if they had children there—and if so, were they happy and well-provided for?) ... until at last I came to the crater; where I quickly noticed something which should have been obvious the day before (but somehow hadn't been), and that was that it was incredibly close to the road itself—and that, indeed, they were separated only by a sandy embankment. An embankment, I soon realized, which still had drag marks in it—as though someone had unearthed whatever had fallen and pulled it up to the road.

I looked back the way I'd come—the rain pelting my jacket, the wind buffeted my hair.

As though someone had loaded it onto a truck; and then driven it—not bothering to pass “Go” or to collect $200—back to the lighthouse at Granite Point.

“AMELIA?” I KNOCKED on her door gently but firmly. “The Jeep’s all ready to go. Also, I—I buried the keeper. I mean it’s pretty shallow, but ... it’ll have to do.”

I waited a moment to see if she’d answer. When she didn’t, I added: “And there’s something else. Something I want to show you.”

Still no answer. Only the breathing of the ocean, the ticking of the grandfather clock. I knocked again.

“Amelia? Hey. You there?”

That’s when I knew. That’s when I knew she’d had the key all along—had it since before I’d even discovered the antechamber; since she’d found it on the hook next to the lighthouse door—and that she must have planted it on the keeper only recently, possibly even the previous night.

And then I was turning the knob and the door was opening—just swinging in as easy as could be—and my shadow had fallen across her bed which was piled with blankets and clothes; after which, sweating and trembling, I looked at the lighthouse door—and saw that it was lazied open.

And began to move toward it.

I SAW IT EVEN BEFORE I saw her—a spearpoint-shaped thing, an impossible thing, a thing blacker than black yet giving off light—which levitated straight as an arrow at the center of the Fresnel and somehow caused it to turn, to warp, to change its shape and then back again, to be at once physical yet abstract. Nor was it the size of even the largest lightbulbs but rather tall as a man, with no surface features whatsoever—like one of those cars which has been painted Vantablack and so absorbs all incidental light—a thing as perfect as it was paradoxical, and which had no color of its own yet somehow radiated multitudes.

A thing beyond which—out on the catwalk—stood Amelia: bare-foot but wrapped in the keeper’s bathrobe; facing away from the black light and myself; facing the sea which rose up and crashed on the rocks.

I circled around toward her but paused, gripping the doorframe. “H-Hello? Amelia? What—what are you doing out there? Are you okay?”

She didn't respond, only continued facing the sea (and the seabirds, which swirled like moths), her hair whipping and lashing—pulsing and glowing—appearing as though it were on fire as I crept onto the catwalk and approached her with caution. As she dropped the robe from her body—revealing herself to be completely nude—and I reached for her shoulder, slowly turning her around.

At which she said, “Careful, it'll eat your eyes,” and looked up at me with eyes that had become black glass—like black, interstellar voids—and yet, not, because they were also full of light; full of pulsars and quasars and nebulae and supernovae; of blue giants and red dwarfs and white fountains and stellar flares—and colors which could not be defined much less comprehended—hues I should not have been able to see but could!

All of which was the moment I looked at the clouds and understood—and knew at once what the queer object was—for it was nothing less than one of the strange lights in the sky; nothing less than one of the architects of the Flashback itself—one that had fallen to Earth like a shooting star and been recovered by the lighthouse keeper after the Collapse (and which he had then placed inside his Fresnel). One that had gotten into Amelia and was in her even now, whispering to her, I realized—even as I backed into the lantern house and she quickly followed—guiding her. Compelling her toward some end I hadn't the ability to imagine.

“You see it—I can tell you do,” she said, having followed my gaze; having focused on the lights in the clouds, on them—whose colors were the same as those in her eyes. “You see it and yet do not fully understand it.” She looked at me and tilted her head; began touching my lips, tracing them as though they were art. “Let it in, Francis. Let it in as I will let you in—here, now, in every way.”

She lowered to her knees—smoothly, silkily—sliding her hands along my body, unfastening my pants. “They have work for us.” She pushed up my shirt and began kissing my stomach. “Do it with me, Francis. Do the work. You said it yourself—they're in Montana. Take me there."

And then she was gripping me and taking me into her mouth, moving her lips up and down, as I put her head in my hands and looked at the thing, the anomaly, the perfect, black arrowhead which somehow emanated light, and which showed me things even as I looked at it—dreadful things, horrible things—images in which people were being murdered by their own trust and generosity; visions in which I saw an entire community lain to waste. Until I could take it no more—for it was the future I saw—and tore myself away: yanking up my trousers and hurrying for the hatch, clambering down the spiral staircase which pulsed and flashed with light, bursting into the antechamber and down the hall into the living room.

Where I snatched up a bottle of whisky and began drinking it raw and undiluted. Where I crumbled to the floor and moaned, wondering what to think or do.

THEY CALL IT THE GOLDEN hour, that period of time right before sunset when the sky glows orange and the shadows lose their edges, and the world becomes, for the space of about 20 minutes, something elevated and painterly—ephemeral, even sublime. That's how the world felt as I sat on the rocks and watched the waves crash and spume—sublime. A thing of such grandeur and beauty that we couldn't help but to stand in awe. And yet, at the same time, weren't we part and parcel? Weren't we built of the same materials—the same substantia primae—and woven into its fabric like threads? And—that being the case—weren't we special too?

"You know it's funny," said Amelia, her voice sounding distant, muted, as though it were coming from a thousand miles away, "but somehow I knew you'd be here."

I looked up as she sat next to me—having put on a jacket like myself—and looked out at the sea, which crashed and breathed. “You always were more thoughtful than you let on,” she said. She leaned into me with surprising intimacy. “More dutiful, more decent. It was the first thing I noticed about you.”

I didn’t say anything, only gazed out at the water and the swirling pterodactyls—one of which glided in for a landing.

At last she said: “It doesn’t have to be this way, you know. We could pretend we never came here ... that nothing ever happened—even go our separate ways, if that’s what you want.”

I looked at my shoes—the ones I’d found at Walmart—and tried to smile. “You’d just come back. Back here, I mean. It—I think it’s a part of you now. Part of your makeup.”

Neither of us said anything as the birds squawked and wheeled and the sun sank toward the sea.

“Maybe. But does it matter? You’d be long gone. And who knows, maybe I can learn something from them. Something that ...” She trailed off; her face suddenly ashen.

“I’m sorry,” I said, and gripped the gun. “But I—I can’t let you do it. And I think we both know why.”

She looked at me somewhat blankly before getting up slowly and walking to the edge of the breaker. “And so you’re just going to casually blow me away, is that it? Just air me out, as they say?” She laughed, but when she turned to face me her eyes were full of compassion, not malice. “And you think you can really do that? Just whiff me out like a match?” She shook her head. “No you can’t, Francis. I know you better than that—or I’d never come with you in the first place. Please. Put down the gun. You’re not a murderer. Not even they could turn you into one. You know that.”

I stood but kept the pistol trained on her, moving toward her slowly, closing the gap between us. “I’m not just going to stand by while you—while you kill the people of Barley. I—I'll never do that, Amelia. I'm sorry. And if that means ... If that means—"

"Shhh," she said. "Listen to yourself." She held her hand out between us. "Give me the gun, Francis. Please. You don't want to do this, I know. Give it to me."

I shook my head, trying to resist. There was something about her now; something about her eyes. Just a hint of strange color—a hint of them—which made them oddly hypnotic, oddly compelling. "I don't—I can't—"

And then she leapt forward—suddenly, violently—snatching the gun from my hand, shoving me from the rock—hard—turning it on me even as I got to my feet—my head bleeding from the fall.

"Well now—how the times change." She cocked the weapon decisively. "And to think it wanted me to kill you and I refused!"

I raised my hands even while avoiding her eyes. "Now, just—settle down, okay? Nobody's going to kill anybody. All right?" I took a step backward—focusing on the gun, on its 9mm barrel. "I mean, we're two for two—right? I spared you ... and now, hopefully, you'll spare me."

She didn't respond, only continued sighting me, her lower lip trembling.

At last she said, "It's crazy, isn't it? Pointing guns at each other—as though we've somehow been enemies and not friends." Her eyes began to well up markedly, profusely. "I've never wanted to hurt you, Francis. But you have to understand, that—I'm no longer alone. That there's something else inside me now, and that it's vying—"

I stepped forward suddenly and she jerked the gun to track me.

"It's all right," I said. "It's all right. It's just that—"

And that's when it happened: that's when the silver and black plesiosaur breached the water like a mirage—its needle-teeth flashing and its dark neck glistening; its great flippers raked back like the wings of a plane—and snatched her from the rocks as though she were a doll. That's when the two of them seemed to hang briefly in the air—painted red den gold and burnt orange by the sun; rendered exquisite for a single fleeting instant—before crashing back to sea with a mighty smack and spray—and vanishing completely in its rough, roiling waters.

BY THE TIME I HEADED out the next day, the sun was at 12 o'clock and I'd fashioned two markers—one for the keeper and one for Amelia—both of which I'd planted atop breakers so they wouldn't be swept away. And then I'd made a sign—a sign for future travelers—which I'd hemmed and hawed over considerably before finally scrawling across it: GO TO BARLEY HOT SPRINGS IN MONTANA. STAY AWAY FROM THE LANTERN. Nor was it lost on me that the strange anomaly—who's very purpose had been to perpetuate the Flashback and thus usher men from the earth—would now be used to connect us; and to offer survivors hope. And I supposed that in the Big Empty, that was as good as it got.

And then I was off—having locked the tower door and disposed of its key—driving through Charleston and Barview and Coos Bay, following Tremont Avenue until it merged with Route 101, driving the Oregon Coast Highway all the way to Tillamook and beyond.

Urban Decay

Each of us, I think, had to understand it on our own terms, the totality of the desolation, the speed at which the old world had fallen away. Each of us, I think, had something of an epiphany looking down at it.

For me, it was seeing the helicopter's shadow slink wraith-like over the hulk-jammed freeways and overgrown downtown intersections, realizing that shadow was the only thing—the only human thing—moving in any direction. For Sam it may have been the aircraft carrier—the USS Nimitz, Roman had said—run aground between Pike Street Market and the big Ferris wheel (and presumably straight into the State Route 99 tunnel). Leastwise that's what she was looking at as she gasped audibly and the helicopter swung north by north-east, over what would have been Belltown, toward the Space Needle.

"You gotta see this," said Roman, his voice sounding generic, condensed, tinny over the headsets. "Anyone here ever seen an eagle's nest? In the wild, I mean?"

Lazaro hmphed. "I've scaled a 200-foot Douglas fir and touched one. Does that count?"

Nigel sneered—you could actually hear it, even from the front. "Ya, mon. But only in your dreams."

Roman nodded at Lazaro. "Yeah? Was it big?" He sounded jocular, condescending. "How big was it, you think?"

"I don't know. About four feet," said Lazaro. He seemed annoyed—even hurt. "What's it matter?"

"I was just wondering how it compared to, say, that, at five o'clock."

We all saw it at once as the helicopter leaned and I was pressed against Sam: a nest the size of one of those above-ground pools—the kind someone like Lazaro might have had before the Flashback—built up around the Needle's radio tower and comprised of what appeared to be mud and fallen timber.

"Jesus, it's everywhere," whispered Sam, her face and chesnut-brown hair—which smelled of honeysuckle and gunpowder—reflected in the glass. “They—they’re blue, teal. Like robins’ eggs.” She shook her head pensively, meditatively. “I wouldn’t have thought that.”

“Where’s momma bird?” said Lazaro.

“That’s a good question,” muttered Roman. He made a complete circuit of the Needle before leaving its orbit completely and heading back in the direction we’d come. “Nor are we sticking around to find out.” His voice became suddenly focused. “Okay. I’m going to fly low between the buildings—because you can bet we’re being watched. So, don’t freak out. The idea is to shield our location from prying eyes for as long as possible—or at least until the chopper’s up and everyone is clear. Got it?”

Check. Downtown Seattle was not a safe place, especially in the business district, and not just because there were pterodactyls roosting in the skyscrapers. For one, it bordered on territory controlled by the Skidders, a ruthless gang which operated out of Doc Maynard’s Public House and Underground Tour in Pioneer Square. It also shared a border with New Beijing and a group called the Gang of Four. Neither, Roman had assured us, were to be trifled with, and both were known to make frequent excursions into the no-man’s land of the business district. Throw in roving packs of velociraptors, which were also territorial, or the occasional tyrannosaurid, or even an herbivore with the Flashback in its eyes, and you had a situation which needed to be gotten into and gotten out of quickly.

And quietly.

“Just stay in range,” I said, checking the switch of my walkie-talkie, making certain it was on. “Or it’ll be a shitshow all over again.”

It was a cheap remark—no one had been closer to Chives than Roman—and one I regretted immediately. “No,” he said, and crossed himself. “It won’t. Trust me. Anything bigger than an alley cat—you’re going to know it. We’ll get you inside, I promise.”

“It’s not getting inside I’m worried about. It’s getting out with what we came for.”

He looked at me with those damned earnest eyes—something I would have preferred he didn't do, especially while thundering between skyscrapers—and smiled. "We'll do that, too. Now lock and load, Jamie. All of you. We're almost there."

"SEE THAT COURTYARD just east of the library? That's our landing zone," said Roman, slowing us to a near hover, beginning to lower altitude.

I watched as the helicopter's shadow grew on the wild, waving grass.

"Again: when you hit dirt I want you to go immediately to the street—5th Avenue, right there, and follow it south-west. Stay close to the buildings, they'll give you some cover. Get ready."

"From predators?" asked Joan, our mechanic, her voice full of doubt. It was her first time out of the compound with us.

"From people," said Roman. "They've been known to snipe from the towers." We touched down with a slight bounce—tall grass lashing at the windows. "Remember, right on Marion ... then all the way to 1st—to the Exchange Building. You can't miss it: there's a Starbucks across the street with a—"

Joan balked. "There must be a hundred—"

"... with a gutted triceratops in its window." He looked at her over his shoulder, then at each of us individually. "It's—it's probably been picked clean by now." He swallowed as though he'd said too much, then straightened suddenly and nodded once. "Everyone just—stay sharp, okay? Good luck."

And then we were moving, piling out of the hatch and into the prop-wash, scrambling for the street, as the Bell 206 climbed—the sound of its rotors thundering, reverberating off the buildings, the grass dancing.

"Other side of the intersection, that condo," I said, "let's go."

We double-timed across the pavement—or what was left of it—to where a concrete overhang offered some measure of cover.

“Hold up,” said Nigel. He dropped to his knees and began assembling his weapon—a commercial weed trimmer outfitted with a 10” saw blade—as Lazaro hovered above him.

“Yeah, hold up. Nigel saw some grass he wants to trim,” said Lazaro.

Nigel primed the trimmer but didn’t start it. “I didn’t hear you complain when this opened the belly of that Barney—you know the one that had you pinned? Or did you forget about that?”

“And covered me with its guts,” said Lazaro. He pumped his shotgun briskly. “You were too close. Charlene would have taken you both.”

“That so, mon? Like it took Chives?”

I glanced at Lazaro and saw him bunching a fist. “Stand down, Lazaro ... I said stand down! Now!” I looked at the others quickly, hoping to quell any unrest. “We all know precisely what happened to Chives ... and there ain’t nothing—I mean nothing—that is going to change that. Ever.” I made eye contact with Nigel as he stood. “He couldn’t be left that way. Period. Now let’s move—Lazaro, take point. Nigel, bring up the rear. Let’s go.”

And we went, hustling down 5th Avenue even as the sky grumbled and it began to spit rain—all the way to Marion Street, at which we turned right ... and were promptly greeted by a hail of gunfire.

AT FIRST IT HAD SEEMED like a miracle, the fact that there was an underground garage opening right there and that we’d all managed to get into it before anybody was hit—at least until the metal gate came rattling down and we realized our attackers hadn’t so much targeted us as herded us directly into a trap.

“Drop ‘em, now!” came a voice, even as we spun in its direction and raised our weapons—and quickly realized there was nothing to shoot at. Nothing visible, at any rate. What there was, however, were tiny red dots—on our foreheads, over our hearts.

“You see them. Good,” said the voice, just as cool as iced tea—the perfect accompaniment to the clatter of shifting firearms. “And now you’re going to bend down ... slowly ... and lay all your weapons at your feet. All right? Nooo one has to get hurt. Just do as I say ... and then we can have a nice conversation. About who you are, for example. And where you’re from. And what you’re doing being dropped off by a helicopter in the middle of disputed territory. Our territory. Okay?”

“Okay,” I said, and nodded at the others—and at Lazaro twice; we’d been in this situation before and he always wanted to play chicken.

Slowly everyone did it—the red dots never wavering, the rain starting to rattle against the gate.

“Is that a weed wacker?” said the voice, and was followed by laughter. “Damn.”

I heard the tapping of what turned out to be an axe head against concrete before I realized he’d stepped into a shaft of gray light. “Don’t let their laughter get to you—people used to laugh at us too.”

We watched, paralyzed, as the bearded silhouette seemed to yawn and stretch. “What can I say? All this rain—it makes me sleepy. I’ll tell you, I could really go for a Flat White about now. Two ristretto espresso shots, some whole milk steamed to perfection, a little ephemeral latte art right in the center. Sounds good, doesn’t it?” He cocked his head in the near perfect silence. “No? What you want then, a bronson? At this hour? A good, earthy black IPA, perhaps? I could go for that. Something with a nice malty backbone—good for the old ticker.” He laughed, seeming to think about it. “I know. Too conventional, right?” He shook his head. “Momma always said: she said, ‘Atticus, all your taste is in your mouth.’”

There was a thin chuckle and a few clanks of the axe. “Kind of mean, don’t you think? Anyway. That’s what she said.”

He began walking toward us—slowly, deliberately—dragging the handle, dragging its blade along the pavement.

“Look,” I said. “We didn’t come here looking for any ...”

“Any what?” He stopped about four feet in front of me, close enough at last for us to have a good look at him, and what we saw seemed utterly incongruous with what Roman had told us—except, of course, for the multitude of tattoos (mostly triangles), and even more so the washboarded scar, which ran from somewhere on his scalp and through an eye (over which one lens of his dark, plastic-framed glasses had been painted black) clear to his left shoulder. That much, at least, fit. What didn’t fit was the slicked-back pompadour and long, full, meticulously-trimmed beard—Jesus, there was even product in it—nor, for that matter, the flannel lumberjack shirt and skinny jeans, not to mention the Converse sneakers. What didn’t fit, as the similarly attired men holding laser-guided rifles emerged from behind overgrown automobiles and support columns, was that the feared and formidable Skidders were, when exposed to the light of day (and not to put too fine a point on it), hipsters.

“Well doesn’t this just take the cake,” said Lazaro, and spit.

“I take it we aren’t what you expected,” said Atticus. He leaned on the axe as though it were a cane. “I must say, neither are you.” His good eye, which was a pale, piercing blue, dropped to our weapons. “You came well-armed. What are those—M4s? Not exactly an easy thing to come by—since Big Green fled the scene.” He raised his chin and cocked his head, studying us. “And that helicopter. I mean, damn. What did you do? Raid a small airport? Got a pilot, even.”

He began pacing, slowly, methodically. “That’s better than a doctor. So, to summarize: You got a helicopter. You got military-issue rifles. You got, well, plumbing—I mean, you’re clean, all of you. You even got ...” He stopped dead in his tracks, dead in front of Sam. “You even got—a girl!” He screwed up his face suddenly and leaned back, staring at Joan, who glowered at him. “Make that plural. Sorry. It’s just that ...” He looked Sam up and down. “It isn’t always this easy to tell—”

“Look, what do you want?” I snapped.

Atticus reared his head back as though he’d been wounded. “Jesus! Tone. I was just going to say how important it is for the fairer sex to be represented in any post-apocalyptic scenario. You know, women.” He leaned close to me, I have no idea why. “My boys call them tassels—fuck if I know. Something out of Williamsburg, I suppose. Like putting crayons in your beard, or whatever.” He stepped back to address us all. “All of which is just my way of saying—you have a home. A base. A place to hang your hat. And because of that, I’ve only got two questions.” He hefted the axe suddenly and decisively—before switching it to his other hand and touching it to the ground. “Where? And why, since you have your own turf, would you come prancing onto ours—a crime punishable by death? I mean, just, holy bugfuck. It had to be for something good, right?”

“What’s it matter if you’re just going to kill us anyway?” protested Lazaro. “You said it yourself: ‘a crime punishable by death.’ So why should we tell you anything?”

“Because information is currency,” said Atticus flatly. He added quickly: “One I might just accept in exchange for your lives. Along with your guns, of course. And maybe the girl. It really all depends on the quality of your—”

But I’d stopped listening: focusing instead on the darkness behind him, behind his men. Because something had moved there. Something amongst the cars.

Several somethings.

“The pharmacy,” I interrupted quickly, almost breathlessly, “the one on Madison Street. B-Bartell Drugs. That’s—that’s where we were going.” I looked sidelong at Sam as sweat beaded along my brow. “We were going to Bartell Drugs—for prenatal vitamins. I’m sorry, Sam.”

“That’s very interesting,” said Atticus, matter-of-factly. “But considering we’re on Marion I’d say you overshot the mark.”

I stared at Sam intensely, trying to communicate in secret, trying to communicate with my eyes alone. “We—couldn’t get to it from there. There were raptors between us and it; at least, that’s what I think they were. They—they were in some kind of utility tunnel, which was dark. I’m the only one who saw them. The others—they, they had to take my word. We we’re looping around the building to bypass the tunnel when you opened fire.” Sam faced forward again and squinted, her expression a mask, her composure unwavering. That’s when I knew she knew.

“As for the guns—take them,” I said, trying not to look into the dark. “Just let us get the supplements. Please.”

I looked to find Atticus staring at me, his head at an angle, his mouth hanging open. Then he guffawed—once, twice—and paced away, raising the axe head as he did so, slapping the flat of its blade against his palm. “Man. You are one noble fuck. All of you. And here I thought you were just a bunch of hardened, cutthroat survivors—come to take a slice of our purloined pie, no doubt.” He stopped suddenly and turned around. “You, with the wire-frame glasses. Raptor-spotter. What’s your name, son?”

I glanced at Sam on one side and Nigel on the other.

“Jamie,” I said, and looked at my shoes. “Jamie Klein.”

“Jamie,” he repeated, and approached to within a few feet. “Jamie Klein.” He pinched the axe between his knees as he began to swing and stretch his arms. “Damn. That suits you, you know? I mean, you seem like a nice guy. A real mensch. Are you Jewish?”

I shook my head.

“No. Well, it’s not important. What is important is that we establish a baseline. Something that, well, will get me the truth—when I ask a simple, goddamn question. So I’m going to ask you one more time, before I give the word. Where is your base-camp? And why—you need to think about this, you might even say your life depends on it—have you come to Pioneer Square?”

“I told you,” I said. “We needed medicine and supplements for—”

“The girl,” he said, and took a step back—even as two of his men (who weren’t training rifles) grabbed Sam by the upper arms and forced her to the pavement.

“Sorry about this, troops—I really am. But I did say it: You needed to think about this one. Carefully.” He took up the axe and tapped its head on the pavement. “I mean, you don’t get to be the Big Dog without keeping your word, right?” He raised the hatchet slowly, confidently, the leather of his half gloves crinkling. “And believe me when I say: When it comes to south Seattle, we are the Big Dog ...”

That’s when something leapt up in the darkness and my eyes darted to the blur—in time to see a blue and red velociraptor pounce the farthest Skidder back: its sickle-foot claws latching firmly into his abdomen, its fore-talons gripping his broad, flannelled shoulders, its jaws closing about his head. And then all was screaming and gunfire—which lit up the garage like the fourth of July and thundered, cracking, off its walls—as I piledrived Atticus and wrested the axe from him; as everyone scrambled for their weapons and the raptors pounced upon more Skidders.

“Lazaro!” I remember yelling—knowing his shotgun could blow the gate, knowing he’d opened locked doors with it before—before a man screamed nearby and I looked: and saw his attacker biting off the top of his head—just opening it like a watermelon, taking everything but his long, full beard.

And then there was a shotgun blast and we were falling back, still firing at the velociraptors, still firing into Atticus’ men—lighting up everything and everyone as we ducked beneath the gate and burst into the rain. As we hustled down Marion Street with Roman thundering above us and the screams of the Skidders still echoing in our heads.

Toward the Exchange Building and a gutted triceratops in the window of a Starbucks. Toward the research and development lab of Roman's former employer ... and something we knew only as Gargantua.

SOMEONE NEEDED TO SAY something, anything. The danger in silence was that, post-Flashback, one inevitably heard the emptiness, the melancholy: the sound of the world just breathing in and out, dreaming. So I said: "For her, the Flashback is over"—hoping it would break the spell of her liquefied eyes and deeply sunken sockets, the pale, wispy hair, the fuzzy white fungus in her nostrils and mouth. Hoping, I suppose, that it would drown out the Nothing—if only for a moment.

"No more power lunches for this babysan," said Lazaro, and spat. He kicked the spilt attaché case at the base of the cycad, where her feet should have been, and paper and cash swirled. "Here one minute—melded with a tree the next. Shit sucks."

Sam stepped closer, examining where the woman's face merged with the tree. "Initial Flashback, you think? Or an aftershock?"

I watched the rain—which had lessened to a drizzle—dribble down the corpse's face and neck. "I don't know, she seems pretty well preserved. Could have been an aftershock."

"Probably suffocated," said Nigel. "Tree manifested and her lungs couldn't expand. Jesus. What a horrible way to go."

I looked at Joan who was white as a ghost. "You all right?"

"Yeah. It's just that ..." She shook her head. "It's nothing."

She jumped as our walkie-talkies squawked; it sure looked like something to me. "Go ahead, Sea One," I said. "What's your twenty?"

I looked to see the Bell 206 arching over Elliott Bay.

"Just west of you—monitoring pack movements near the Colman ferry terminal. Carnotauruses, by the looks of it. I take it you're at the Exchange?"

"Affirmative—and awaiting instructions."

“Through the double doors, left at the first hall, all the way to the end. Austin Dynamics and Land Systems. They’ll be a secure door—you’ll have to blow it. And hurry, because there are predators of the human variety on the move in Pioneer Square.”

I peered at the sky, at what Roman called the Mesozoic Borealis, watching the colors bleed in and out of each other, watching them shift and change shape. “Yeah, ah, about that. Requesting alternative escape route—Over. We have had contact with Skidders. I repeat, we have had contact with them. We—they’re all dead. Over.”

But there was nothing, just the sound of the helicopter.

At last Roman said, “That’s unfortunate. But it doesn’t change a thing. Escape route is still 1st Avenue through Pioneer Square to Edgar Martinez Drive—then I-90 to Issaquah. Do you copy?”

That’s when I saw it: him, the kid, dirty-faced and wild-eyed, his hair like an unkempt mane, listening to us from the nearby stairwell—like the feral boy in The Road Warrior, I swear.

“Hey!” I shouted, drawing the attention of the others, “Hey, kid! Hold up!”

But he was already gone—climbing from the well at its opposite end, bolting up the shattered sidewalk like a gazelle. Weaving right at 2nd Avenue—where he vanished into the primordial mist.

“JESUS,” SAID LAZARO, before the overheads had even finished flickering on. “I mean ... Who was this thing even built for, Godzilla?”

I stared at the vehicle, which was the length of a small yacht, say, 50 feet. “Well, not to put too fine a point on it, it was built for us. Or whoever survived whatever apocalypse Dannon had dreamed up.”

I approached the rover and slid my hand up one of the tires—which was taller than I was, by about a foot. “Welcome to the world of big tech billionaires and their passion projects.” The rubber felt stiff, unyielding, like polished wood. “His was to build a fully self-contained armored expedition vehicle—a kind of mini-Noah’s Ark—something that could not only sustain life but go about exploring what was left of the world—if and when the shit ever hit the fan.”

I circled the big rig while gazing up at its slanted cab and wide, black grill, its array of lights, its giant push and roll bars. The thing was like a van-version of the Cybertruck but on fucking steroids. “Reckon he was like Mr. Musk—in need of a challenge, but also a moral imperative to justify it. For him that was this apocalypse he saw coming.” I paused to examine the roof turret and what appeared to be a .50-caliber machine gun. “A virus, maybe. Or a war. Dinosaurs probably weren’t in his game plan.”

“Looks they were getting ready to test it,” said Sam. “Look.”

I looked to where a massive steel ramp (we’d descended stairs to get to the production floor) ended at an equally massive door. “Good. Looks like this might be easier than we—”

There was a rattle of weapons followed by Lazaro shouting, “Stop! Get on the ground!” —and I hurried to see what the commotion was; at which instant I saw a man in a blue shop-coat standing by a huge sphere and holding what looked like a small, olive-colored ball over his head—a ball with a ring attached, through which he’d looped a trembling finger.

“He’s got a bomb!” I shouted—but resisted raising my rifle. “Everyone just chill! Okay?”

No one did—chill, that is—but no one fired either, and a moment or two passed in silence.

At last the man said, “See this big tank here, this round monstrosity?” He indicated the white metal container next to him, which was taller even than he was. “That would be propylene gas—enough to level this entire floor, maybe the building itself. See this?” He nodded at the olive-colored ball. “That’s your standard military-issue hand grenade, courtesy of the kids who were stationed here before they and the city fell. See those?” He nodded at some handles and hoses near the floor.

“Those are the valves I loosened as you were making your way here. If you don’t smell it yet, you will. It’s strong. Now. Any questions?”

“Only one,” I said, and pushed up my glasses. “What do you want?”

He shifted his footing as though preparing for a long standoff. “I want you to lower your weapons,” he said, and wiggled his fingers near the pin—keeping himself on his toes. “Lower them and kick them toward me, all of you. Then we’ll talk.”

Nobody said anything.

At last I set down my rifle and motioned for the others to do the same. “Do it,” I said, and slowly raised my arms. “You too, Lazaro. Let’s go.”

The weapons clattered as they were placed on the floor and punted toward him.

He lowered his arms cautiously. “There, see? We’re still capable of it—rational thought. It hasn’t gone the way of the dinosaur.” He laughed at that, but kept the grenade close to his chest. “Yet.”

He looked at our weapons as though running calculations through his head. “There’s Neanderthals roaming the streets, did you know that? Real ones—not supporters of President Tucker.” He paused, seeming to size us all up. “Remember them? With their little red hats and faces all puffed in rage?” He chuckled. “Fell off the flat earth, I guess. No, these are genuine Homo sapiens neanderthalensis—right beside modern man and triceratops; right beside honkers from the Jurassic and Cretaceous and Triassic. Just sort of one big medley—like Time itself was put in a blender, or a concrete mixer, or a cream separator, and churned.”

He seemed to relax a little and even lowered the grenade.

“I’m Ewan, by the way. Ewan Homes. I—I was Gargantua’s chief engineer. Before life put us all in the blender.”

“Jamie,” I said. “Jamie Klein. This is Sam.” I indicated the others. “That’s Lazaro, Nigel, and Joan. We—we’re from Issa—”

“Jamie, don’t,” interrupted Sam.

"It's all right," I said—and meant it. I trusted him; I don't know why. "We're from Issaquah. Got a camp there in what used to be a drive-in theater; it's got walls, vegetable gardens, some chickens and goats—there's even some generators, if you want to watch a movie. The thing is—Ewan—it's not overcrowded. And what I'm going to suggest just now is that—"

"Nothing leaves this facility," he snapped—simply, with finality. "That includes me." He raised the grenade tentatively and reached for the pin—then hesitated, his eyes searching mine, or seeming to. "No ... no, I don't hear it. It's not there." He lowered the olive-colored explosive slowly, tentatively. "The guile of the predator, the cunning of the fox. It's not there. You speak ... earnestly."

I let down my arms carefully, incrementally, maintaining eye contact. "I speak as someone who has sought Gargantua while not knowing it had a guardian, a sentinel, which is yourself, or at least how you see yourself. I speak as someone who has faced the Big Empty alone just as you have—and knows it is not for lack of bread that a man dies, but lack of purpose, and that you have found yours in the guarding of this machine, this vehicle—a vehicle that, for whatever reason, you cannot even drive yourself, or you would have done so already. And I'll offer you another way—Ewan, chief engineer at Austin Dynamics and Land Systems, whose budget was 8.5 million per fiscal year and who's assistant was named Roman Daystrom, your best friend—if you'll just turn off that fucking gas."

BY THE TIME I'D REINTRODUCED Roman and Ewan via radio, and the former had convinced the latter to not only come with us but to let someone other than himself drive Gargantua (Ewan, we were told, was blind as a bat), and Nigel had escorted the engineer to his quarters so he could retrieve some of his effects, the clock on the wall of the shop read half past one—more than enough time for the Skid-ders to have organized some type of counter-strike; a fact that weighed heavily on my mind as the women and I began gathering up specs and schematics and Lazaro paced the room impatiently.

“What the hell’s taking them so long? You heard Roman—carnotauruses, heading this way. Oh, I forgot. Nigel’s on Jamaican Time.”

“They have been gone awhile,” said Sam. “Maybe we should—”

“It’s no good splitting us up,” I said. “There’s no telling how quickly we might have to leave. Nigel’s got it—everyone just chill.” I looked at Lazaro. “Can you give us a hand with these? They’re going to be heavy.”

“Why the hell are we carting them along, then?” He snatched up one of the boxes with a huff and headed for Gargantua. “Or him, for that matter? Dude is definitely a few sandwiches short of a picnic.”

“You going to fix this thing when it—” began Joan, but Lazaro was already up the ramp.

We continued working in silence.

At length Sam said, “Who was he, you think? That kid?”

I shrugged my shoulders. “Just a kid. Probably been on his own since the Flashback, who knows?” I heaped some manuals into a box—which created a cloud of dust. “He gave me a start, that’s for sure. I didn’t really get a good look at him.”

“I did ...” She paused as though visualizing him. “He had bones around his neck, did you know that? Or teeth—like, really big ones. He’d strung them together as a sort of necklace. Isn’t that odd, you think?”

Our faces were close as I stopped to reflect. “I don’t know. Is it? Maybe he’s extracting them from dead Barney’s, like trophies. I confess, my first thought was that he’d gone feral. And yet ... He was wearing contemporary clothes, I remember that. Puffy coat, jeans, tennis shoes. I mean, he wasn’t like Mowgli or anything.”

She looked at me and started to grin. “I didn’t think he was like Mowgli ...”

"All right! Drop your cocks and grab your socks," belted Lazaro—from the top of the ramp. "They're back."

I looked to see Nigel and Ewan entering the shop from the left, the latter seeming like an utterly new man—his hair no longer mussed; his clothes no longer a catastrophic mess.

"Apologies, apologies, a thousand apologies," he said, before pausing to admire Gargantua. "But a maiden voyage such as this requires a fresh change of clothes." He looked on a moment longer and then dropped to one knee—began ruffling through his overpacked bags. "Ah, yes, here it is. It's—I opened it with Nigel." He withdrew a corked bottle—which glinted darkly in the light from a high window. "Voila! One of eight bottles of Dom Perignon Rose champagne, Vintage 1959, served in Persepolis in 1971 by the then-Shaw of Iran."

He looked at us with a face flushed with excitement, and we looked back.

"To—to celebrate the 2500th anniversary of the founding of the Persian Empire ... by Cyrus the Great." Disappointment stole over his face like a shadow. "It's—it's to break over the bow, as it were. To christen Gargantua." Nobody said anything. "Yeah—well. Waste of liquor, anyway. Especially when I've got so much celebrating to do. I'll, ah—I'll just get the door. Over there."

He moved up the ramp toward the garage door.

That's when I thought of Lazaro's admonition, I don't know why: You heard Roman—carnotauruses, heading this way.

"Wait, Ewan," I said.

But he was already there, triggering the great door with his fist, turning to look at us as it rattled upward, pulling the cork from the champagne. "Life is for the living," he said, and toasted us with the bottle. "And this stuff ..." He poured champagne into his mouth and down the sides, soaking his clean, white shirt, splattering the floor with foam. "This is for howl—"

But then the door was open and they were there, the carnotauruses, and one closed its jaws about his scalp while another laid wide his abdomen (and another took up his legs) so that, howling, he was opened like a pizza being groped by eager hands. And then they themselves howled and piled over his body, and all we could do was to run—everyone save Nigel, who had his trimmer, which he started with a sputter—because our weapons were already in the rover.

WOULD WE HAVE MADE it to the truck if Nigel hadn't done what he did? I don't know—maybe. But I doubt it. The fact is these carnotauruses were moving—faster than I'd ever seen them move before—and had cut the distance between us in half before I heard the revving of Nigel's trimmer and saw him sweeping it across a dinosaur's belly, opening it like a can of spaghetti.

"Someone start the truck!" he shouted, his voice raw, animalistic, "I'll hold them off as long as I can!"

I scrambled up the stairs after Sam and Joan but before Lazaro. "Joan, this is your gig," I said, before essentially falling through a portal into the cockpit. "Get us out of here."

But she just stood there, looking around the deck and the crush of dials and switches; looking as if the vehicle itself might swallow her at any moment. "No ... No, I'm sorry. But I can't ... I just ..."

I indicated the co-pilot's seat. "Sam."

She buckled into her harness as I took the driver's seat and did the same, hoping that what Roman had told me was true—that Gargantua could pilot herself—and hoping, too, that I could remember the test protocol he'd so wisely insisted I study.

"Gargantua, this is Jamie—and I'm going to be your test driver today." I looked out the massive, slanted windshield to where Nigel had thrust his trimmer's saw-head into the mouth of a carnotaurus, only horizontally, after which he leveraged the shaft brutally—and popped off the top of the thing's head. "We are go for power on. I repeat: We are go for power on. Initiate protocol."

I watched as blood geysered from the beast's lower mandible—even as nothing seemed to happen with the vehicle.

"Gargantua. Initiate protocol."

"I got a bad feeling about this," said Sam, even as the creatures closed in around Nigel, and Lazaro opened fire from the ramp. "I mean, if you could just bounce in here and say 'go' then it obviously—"

"Clearance is Delta-Delta—Dawn," I said rapidly, recalling the code words Roman had insisted I memorize, recalling how well he'd prepared me should something happen to Joan, as the consoles lit up like Christmas trees and the screens flickered to blue life; as the rover's hybrid engines hummed and whirred and pulsed, powerfully. "Issaquah via I-90, go!"

And then we were moving, smoothly, robustly (after an initial lurch), as one of the screens showed the stairs beginning to retract and Nigel rushed onto them—where he was assisted by Lazaro—as we clanked onto the ramp and powered up its traction-metal and finally burst onto the street.

"Sea One, this is Away Team Alpha, we are on our way!"

I looked up through the cockpit's huge windshield in time to see the Bell 206 thundering overhead—zooming toward Pioneer Square and the headquarters of the Skidders; zooming toward Edgar Martinez Drive and I-90 and home. "Do you copy?"

"Copy you loud and clear, Away Team Alpha," said Roman at last, euphorically, and laughed. "Congratulations."

I looked over my shoulder as Nigel and Lazaro joined us on the bridge, then forward again through the tinted windshield—where the streetlights were passing dangerously close to the roof. "Everybody hang on, we could run out of clearance fast."

There was a frap-frap-frap as the twigs of trees started colliding with us. That's when I first noticed it: him, her—a lone figure—walking out into the middle of the road, stopping between us and Pioneer Square. Turning to face us as I instinctively hit the brakes.

“Auto-pilot disengaged,” said a voice—Majel Barrett’s from Star Trek, I swear; some geek’s idea of a joke.

“Is that who I think—” Sam started to say but then trailed off.

I peered through the angled glass, which was bullet-proof, I presumed, I mean it was thick, as the truck ground to a stop and the figure came into focus—beard, flannel, and all.

It was Atticus.

“Well, well,” said Lazaro, sardonically. “Slippery motherfucker, isn’t he?” He added: “What’s that?”

I looked to where another figure had entered the street to join him, a smaller figure, wearing a puffy black coat and blue jeans, whose hair was wild and unkempt. A figure who wore a necklace of large teeth around his neck—T. rex teeth, by the looks of it—and smiled gap-toothed as Atticus ruffled his hair.

The kid. The feral boy. Mowgli, whatever.

But that wasn’t all, for there were others now too—not Skidders, there were no beards or flannel or Converse shoes—just people: men, women and children, most of them disheveled, who walked out single-file and formed a living fence across the road— even as another group (visible on one of the monitors) did the same behind us. And it was at precisely that instant that I glimpsed the first of the red dots—which were fleeting, erratic, sometimes holding on a person’s head, sometimes roaming—and realized just how much trouble we were in. How trapped we’d become.

TIME HAD STOPPED—not because of any Flashback or roiling time-storm or strange, vague lights in the sky, or because fully three quarters of the human population had vanished without a trace (and been replaced with prehistoric flora and fauna), but because we’d been outsmarted, pure and simple. And now all we could do was watch, as the rows of people in front of us and behind began to lay themselves on the ground and another brought Atticus a megaphone—which he lifted to his mouth while steadying himself with his ax and directed at the rover’s cab.

“Well, just check ... this ... out! Damn!” He acted as though he might slap his knees. “‘Gargantua One.’ What do you know? I mean, what will they think of next?”

The feral kid appeared to laugh as the wind gusted suddenly and the branches of the trees swayed.

“Those are some prenatal vitamins, I must say. I can see now why you thought this was important enough to risk your lives. Not to mention kill or allowed to be killed some of my best men.”

My mind raced. Time. We needed time. I searched the banks of switches and readouts for a means of communication and found a toggle marked ‘loudspeaker,’ which I flipped.

“I seem to recall you were about to chop off Sam’s head,” I said, hoping it would keep him jabbering for at least a minute.

“And snip such a fine tassel?” He laughed. “Not on this watch, Midtown. You need to learn to recognize bullshit when you see it—”

I switched off the loudspeaker. “We need ideas—fast.”

“For what?” said Nigel. “You can see all the red dots. He’s got us in a hopeless situation, tactically.”

“That’s bullshit, man,” snapped Lazaro. “There’s a machine gun on top of this thing.”

“And what are you going to shoot at? The air? They’re hidden in the buildings all around. You’ll be lucky to get in a burst before—”

“He’s right,” I said. “It’s no good. Those people aren’t just human barriers—they’re hostages. We start fooling around with that gun ... and they’re toast.” I keyed the mic of my radio. “Sea One, this is Away Team Alpha. Come back.”

Atticus continued: "... gangland theatrics. How else was I going to get you to talk? I knew you were after some kind of kale ..."

Our radios squawked. "Go ahead."

"Listen, Roman, quickly: We are surrounded by Skidders and need technical data regarding Gargantua— defense mechanisms, weapons systems, whatever you got. And we need it fast."

He responded almost instantly. "Where is Ewan, asleep?"

I started to speak but hesitated, wondering if I should tell him now or later; if I should disrupt his focus. "He ... he's passed out in the back. He was ... he was pretty drunk."

But there was no response and we listened to Atticus as we waited; luckily for us, the motherfucker liked to talk.

"... and consider yourselves lucky you didn't run into, say, Antifa. Don't laugh—those little fuckers are hard. Like a bunch of Viet Cong running around in black pajamas. Saw them go up against a militia once—might have been White Out, I'm not sure ..."

"Okay, listen up," came Roman at last, his voice full of urgency. "The gun up top can be operated from inside as well as out, you just have to use the joystick, which is on the right side of the driver's seat. There should be a pair of sighting goggles also, hanging above, which are slaved to the .50-cal—you'll use these to acquire targets. Just hit 'auto' on the joystick and you'll be golden. There's also smoke dispensers mounted on both sides of the vehicle, the switch is right above you, but I don't advise using them—they're too effective and you'll be blinded for several minutes. At least. Other than that the vehicle was designed primarily for exploration, so I don't know what—can I provide any sort of air cover? Prop-wash, for example?"

"Negative, I repeat, negative. It's too tight in here. Just stand by."

Atticus, meanwhile, was still going on: "... ever seen a pack of allosaurs take down a diplodocus? That's what this was like. Just hit and run, hit and run, until the big dumb bastards collapsed from their own weight. Now they're dead—and a bunch of skinny anarchists have AR-15s ...”

I peered at the old buildings through the trees and at the darkened windows, many of them without glass. If it had been even slightly foggy or misty—as it had been earlier—we might have traced the beams right back—

My heart must have skipped a beat, I'm sure of it. Jesus, I thought. Could it be that simple?

“What is it?” asked Sam, sounding concerned.

I reached for the goggles and slowly slid them on, then gripped the joystick cautiously. “See that switch right there? The illuminated blue one?” She nodded warily, her face pale. “That's the smoke dispensers. When I give the word I want you to flip it, okay? Don't be scared.”

“What are you doing?” snapped Lazaro, with a clear edge to his voice. “Sandahl, what is he doing?”

“I'm getting ready to target those snipers,” I said, and pressed the ‘auto’ switch, making sure to keep my head perfectly still lest the machine gun swivel and alert Atticus. “Nigel, get ready on the loudspeaker. On my word only I want you to order those people to get up and get clear. Make sure they understand—we are coming through. There can be no confusion. Lazaro, I want you to open the side door—but do not lower the ramp—and take a position; at my word you'll use my M4 to clear targets on the right side of the truck only, understand? I'll take care of the left and then swing around to help you.”

I waited for him to acknowledge and when he didn't I snapped, “Do you understand? We don't have time for this.”

“Yes, I understand!”

“Good. Now—Joan. Where are you, girl?”

She stirred in the seat behind me. “I'm—I'm sorry, Jaime. I'm so sorry. But I—”

“You don't have to be,” I said. “I know it's cramped in here. And I'm sorry I didn't listen to you when you tried to tell me about ... your condition. But you're going to make it, all right? We all are. Just buckle up and hold tight, and try to focus on what's outside. Just like you did in the helicopter— okay? You got this."

"I got this," she repeated, and exhaled sharply.

Atticus, meanwhile, had been counting down. "Three ... two ... one." He sighed and lowered the megaphone—then lifted it to his mouth again. "The problem with you, Jaime, is that you just—don't—listen. Now I just explained to you what was going to happen if I reached 'one' and you hadn't come out, and goddamned if you didn't come out. So. What's going to happen now is that we're going to kill one of these people for every 30 seconds you remain inside the vehicle—starting immediately." He directed the bullhorn at the upper floors of one of the buildings. "Hershel? You awake up there?"

"Get ready," I said.

"I'm awake," came a voice, though it was impossible to tell exactly where from.

"Fine," said Atticus. "Hershel, in 30 seconds, I want you to place your site on the head of ... that little girl, right there." He gestured at a storefront on our right side—Simply Seattle. "Green coat, last one on the end, right next to the display window. Copy that there, Chief?"

The man didn't hesitate. "Twenty-nine! 28! 27 ..."

I toggled the loudspeaker myself. "We're coming out," I said, suddenly, and glanced at Sam. "We're trying to figure out how."

There was a silence as Atticus seemed to think about this.

At last he said, "Well, how complicated could it be? Just open the door. Hershel, keep counting ..."

"Twenty-three, 22, 21 ..."

"It's not that simple," I hurried to say, "It's, like, pressurized or something." To the others I said, "On my mark, okay? Get ready."

"We're at 18 seconds and counting, James," said Atticus. "Best clean your glasses and get with it."

"Seventeen, 16, 15 ..."

“Okay! Okay. We’re depressurizing. Right ... now.”

And then Sam was toggling the smoke as I gripped the joystick tightly and Nigel took over the loudspeaker and Lazaro opened the side door, after which we cursed loudly and bent to our tasks, and, together, threw wide the gates of Hell.

IT STARTED, INNOCUOUSLY enough, with the thump, thump, thump of the smoke grenades, which launched at an angle from both sides of the cab and bounced off the overhanging tree branches—as well as breaking at least one nearby window—before falling to the pavement and bursting into clouds of gray smoke. Nor did anything happen immediately—almost as if everyone outside were in a state of shock. But then the smoke began to rise, obscuring everything, and illuminating too the beams of the lasers—which lengthened as I tracked them and led straight to the top floors of Doc Maynard’s Public House—at which I depressed the ‘fire’ button and lit them up; even as Lazaro opened fire on the other side and feedback whined from the loudspeakers.

“Move—if you would live,” shouted Nigel. “Get up and run, all of you! We’re advancing.”

But we’d spent our surprise and what Skidders remained in the windows rallied, opening fire indiscriminately, shooting blindly into the smoke, as their muzzles flashed like Xs and we continued to cut them down; as Nigel repeated his directive and my foot hovered over the gas. “Are they clear yet, Sam? Are they out of the way?”

I continued to fire even as bullets impacted against the windshield and side window, cracking them in rings, leaving huge craters.

“I don’t know, I think so,” she said. “They’re scrambling, I saw that much.”

“Then we’re going,” I said. “Nigel, give them a final warning.”

"But how can you drive with the windows smashed?" protested Sam—even as more rounds impacted the glass. "How can—"

"Engage the auto-pilot!" I shouted, aiming at what appeared to be the last holdout, holding down the 'fire' button, feeling the cab vibrate and shake.

"But I don't know—"

"Got it," blurted Joan—having rallied herself, or so it seemed.

And then the engines were humming, pulsing—winding up like great turbines, moving us forward into the mists.

"We're all clear!" shouted Lazaro. "It's Issaquah or bust!"

And with that we emerged from the clouds; to see what could only be Atticus himself running down 1st Avenue, his unbuttoned flannel shirt flying out behind him, his Converse sneakers pounding the pavement. The feral kid, meanwhile, was nowhere to be seen.

"Jesus, does he even know we're coming?" asked Sam.

"No," I said, squinting between the cracks. "We're on electric."

"Good," said Lazaro. "Run the fucker over."

I tapped the gas pedal, to take it out of auto-pilot, having found a spot through which I could see clearly. "I'm reverting to manual," I said, having no intention of running him down like a dog.

But nothing seemed to happen; we just continued moving forward—picking up speed—until trees were blowing past on one side and buildings were blurring past on the other.

"It'll go around," said Joan. "The sensors haven't picked him up yet, that's all."

But I wasn't so sure as the gap between us closed rapidly—so rapidly I could see his buttocks pumping beneath the skinny jeans and his keys dancing wildly at his hip. And then he disappeared beneath the rig with a pronounced thump and the cab jolted, bouncing once, and I glanced at the rear-view monitor in time to see a skid of dark blood and bone and guts extending out behind us almost indefinitely.

“Okay ... so I thought I was better,” said Joan, still staring at the screen—her face green as a ghost. “But I’m not.” Her cheeks puffed suddenly as though she might vomit. “We need to pull over, I think. Like, now.”

“Okay. I’ll try,” I said, and tapped the gas pedal.

But this time, control reverted back to me—as it was supposed to do—and as we passed Jackson Street I began looking for a place to pull over, because it was finished, I knew. We were safe.

We’d survived the Dinosaur Apocalypse. Again.

BY THE TIME WE DID pull over—or rather, ground to a halt in the middle of the street—rain was starting to speckle the windshield (or what was left of it) and the sky had darkened, none of which prevented Joan from leaping onto her seat the moment we stopped and grabbing the handle of one of the ceiling hatches.

“Is that a good idea?” I asked, as she turned the handle and pushed the hatch open. “We haven’t even had a look around yet—”

But she had already burst through the opening and was gasping for air, sucking it into her lungs in great, shuddering gulps, exhaling as though she’d been holding her breath for a lifetime. “I—I don’t care,” she rasped, as though she were collapsing from exhaustion. “Couldn’t ... couldn’t breathe. Couldn’t—do it a second longer.”

“What’s wrong with her?” asked Lazaro.

“She’s fine,” I said, breathing in the fresh air myself, feeling relieved, almost euphoric. “Little bit of claustrophobia, that’s all. Take all the time you need, Joan. We’re done with this now. We’re all done.”

Everybody seemed to relax in their seats, exhaling, stretching their muscles. It was the first real rest we’d had since leaving the drive-in that morning.

“Well, would you look at that,” said Lazaro at last, peering out his window, and laughed.

I followed his gaze to where a black awning with white letters read COWGIRLS INC – AMERICAN SALOON.

“Never heard of it,” I said, and winked at Sam.

“I could go for a drink or five about now,” said Joan, and laid her head on her arms.

“I could go for one of those waitresses dancing on the bar and shaking her ass in my face,” said Lazaro.

“Ewan had the right idea,” sighed Joan, and shifted her weight. “With that bottle of champagne, I mean.” She fell silent for a moment as though remembering. “What was he saying when ... when ...”

I thought back on it, on that awful moment when the carnotaurus-es had torn him limb from limb. “He was in the middle of saying ‘howl,’ I think,” I said, and slumped against my window. “That the champagne was for howling, not busting over Gargantua, to christen it. I think he’d been alone so long that he’d died a little, or even a lot. We’d given him hope. A reason to howl at the moon, or something.”

Nobody said anything as the clouds rumbled overhead and the rain grew heavier, drizzling around the ringed cracks in the windshield, trickling down Joan’s coveralls.

“I want to dance in the rain,” said Sam, softly.

“We want you to too,” said Lazaro.

“Aaoooh!” crooned Joan, and when I looked she’d stood straight again and spread her arms at the sky.

“Aaoooh!” responded Lazaro, almost as though he were drunk.

And then Nigel joined in, followed by Sam, and finally myself, and there we all were, howling at the sky like a bunch of damn lunatics, beating our chests for having survived another day—spreading our fiery, Phoenix wings in defiance of what we’d done and still had to do and what had become of the world.

And it was on the tip of my tongue to suggest we actually go in and have a drink—or five—when Joan’s body seized up like a vice and her voice became muffled, at which I squinted through Lazaro’s window and saw the lower body of the tyrannosaur (or whatever it was), and realized its head would have been exactly where she was—and that the new sound I was hearing, which was a garbled sound, an obscene sound, was that of Joan screaming; whimpering; suffocating no doubt in the monstrous animal's palette, before it jerked its head and she was yanked clean from the hatch. Before the great and terrible animal stepped back and began shaking her like a ragdoll, even though she was surely dead already, hurling her against the pavement with a sickening smack, pinning her there with its tri-clawed foot; which is when I stepped on the gas—but not before seeing her come apart like mozzarella—and drove away as fast as I could.

After which we drove the rest of the way home in silence and tried not to think of all the blood splattered around the hatch and pooled like thick, dark wine in her seat. After which we kept our heads down and our eyes alert, all the way to Issaquah and the drive-in we called home. All the way until we greeted Roman at the heli-pad with open arms and walked together, through the cool shadows of the carports, to our respective campers and trailers and RVs.

Burn

Because the windows were bulletproof, it all had to come out through the main entrance, and that included the grand piano in the Entrance Hall—which we wheeled recklessly against the doorframe before upending it with a huff and shoving it down the stairs, where it sounded briefly, chaotically, as it impacted each step. By then I was leaning on one side of the door while Fiona leaned on the other, looking on: at our friends as they started busting up the instrument below with bats and feet and sledgehammers, but also at the overgrown North Lawn of the White House and its spitting, crackling bonfire; at the tricked out Hondas and Toyotas as they continued pouring onto the field and bringing more—more beer kegs and more gasoline, more children of the Flashback, more us.

“Look at it, big sister,” I said, finding her already staring at me in the flickering semi-dark, “It’s like poetry, I swear.”

“Green Room,” she answered calmly, seeming almost to smolder. “And stop calling me that.”

My eyes flicked up and down her body—something they’d been doing a lot of lately—but I don’t think she noticed. Of course she was right; a lot had changed since our first burn—not the least of which was my voice—and calling her that no longer seemed appropriate. She, too, had changed—becoming less like a big sister (or even a mother) and more like an equal, even if, at 19, she still had a good 4 years on me.

“Okay, babe,” I said, winking at her. I kicked the pedestal and candelabra next to me over with a resounding crash. “So let’s do it.”

And we went to work, Fiona pulling down the pictures and the red and green curtains while I took my bat to the china cabinet—smashing the glass as though it were a thin layer of ice, sending shards of it flying, bludgeoning the green plates and gold leafed vases like piñatas, like the shattered skulls of imagined enemies, until 243 years of history lay a glistening wreck at my feet—just so much broken detritus to be burned with the rest; just so much dust and memory to be erased and finally forgotten. At which I looked at Fiona and she looked back, smiling, her teeth large and slightly crooked, carnivorous—because it was a pleasure to burn, an ecstasy to burn.

BY THE TIME WE REJOINED the party, the bonfire was licking at the boughs of the maple trees and the staging had been erected for Calvin's speech—staging he was already ascending, gripping the rungs with one hand while holding a rolled up document—or documents—in the other, the firelight reflecting off his glasses.

"So what's he going to talk about?" I asked Fiona, heaving one of the two chairs I'd brought onto the fire—its red upholstery going up like dry paper, creating plumes of black smoke.

"How should I know? He's barely said two words to me since North Carolina." She pitched the framed pictures she was carrying—one of a dude she'd called Jimmy Carter—onto the roaring heap. "Look, Leif. I know he's something of a hero to you ... but you don't know him like I do. And I'm telling you, his heart's no longer in this. The Burning. It hasn't been since Georgia. At least."

I threw the other chair onto the pyre. "But it was his idea in the first place—wasn't it? Isn't that what you said—"

"I've said a lot of things," she snapped, and used her whole body to throw the second picture. "People change, Leif. At least some do. Others just get old."

I paused, thinking about that. Had something happened between them, like a fight? What did that mean, 'Others just get old?'

"Okay, wild children, listen up!" cried Calvin from the top of the platform—and waved the rolled up documents to get everyone's attention. "Hear, hear! You're having way too much fun."

It took a minute but eventually the car stereos and loose chatter diminished and the silence reasserted itself—or nearly so, for the fire continued to crack and to pop and to roar like a veritable furnace.

“But then, why else would God have invented adolescence—if not to have fun?”

Hoots and cheers, whistles and applause.

“And that we have had. From Austin to Baton Rouge and Jackson to Montgomery, from Atlanta to Raleigh and Norfolk to Richmond ... to come at last to Washington, and the seat of Old Power itself. To come at last to the very pinnacle of what we set out to do—which was to loot and burn every vestige of what had come before; every deed and every banknote, every binding contract and article of law, and to cede them back to whatever chaos must ultimately rule our lives.”

He looked out over us, his friends, his people, and seemed to reflect. “And yet I wonder—what remains of the old world and the old laws to douse and burn? I mean, besides these ...” He lifted the rolled papers above his head, inciting raucous applause. “These relics of a by-gone age— which Leif and Fiona have so brazenly liberated? Well, I tell you, there is one thing—but we’ll save that for later, when they return ...”

I looked at Fiona and she looked back. Were we going back to the Archives?

“For now, let us commend these, one U.S. Constitution and one Declaration of Independence, to the fires of a New World—a world as young and savage and beautiful as we are, for it has yet to see even its 30th month, just as we have yet to see our 30th year. And afterward, afterward, I’ll have a special announcement. Right now it’s time to party; and to dance on the grave of that which is old and dead—and which never served us anyway. Salud!”

“Salud!” echoed the crowd, raising their plastic cups.

And then he was unfurling the documents and dropping them into the fire, which hissed and popped and seemed almost alive, and Fiona and I were shoving our way through the crowd—both of us, I think, wondering where we were being sent, and more importantly, what this ‘special announcement’ might be.

“BABE,” SAID CALVIN, descending the ladder, and I looked away as he and Fiona embraced (briefly), I’m not sure why.

“Got another job for you two—if you’re up to it.”

“If we’re up to it,” said Fiona, and laughed, at which there was an awkward silence I didn’t understand. “I know: You want us to take a group of bad apples and put down the Norsemen. Am I right?”

The Norsemen were the older group whose territory we’d violated in order to access the White House and National Mall—and who were bound to cause us trouble if we didn’t leave soon.

“Wrong. I want you to go to the National Museum and liberate the Star-Spangled Banner—the flag, not the song—and bring it here to be burned.”

Fiona shot me a glance. “He’s a vandal, Leif, not a fighter.”

“I’m not a killer, if that’s what you mean,” he retorted, then turned away and watched the fire, hands on his hips. “Nor will I let any of us be. I mean, if I’ve said it once I’ll say it again: this isn’t about bloodshed. It’s not even about rebellion. It’s more about ...” He paused—as though saying anything else could only lead to regret.

“I thought it was about nothing,” said Fiona, softly. “That that was its beauty—it was wildness for the sake of wildness. Passion for the sake of passion. Isn’t that what you said?” She laughed with surprising bitterness. “Different context, I guess.”

“It was about filling the nothing,” he said, still facing away. “And letting go. Until ... But then—you haven’t had to think about any of that ... have you? No one’s made you king.”

“And cue the Messiah Complex,” fumed Fiona, which I took as my cue to leave; to give them space—to let them hash it out, whatever it was—after which I wandered over to one of the kegs and filled a cup, reckoning that next to a roaring fire wasn’t the best place to keep beer—because it tasted like piss, literally. Nor did I stop at one but downed three in rapid succession, wondering what Calvin had meant by ‘filling the nothing’ and ‘letting go,’ and about being king—not to mention starting a sentence with ‘until’ ... but never finishing it.

And I guess I must have stood there for a while, because I distinctly recall watching the same group of teens—their arms laden with destruction—moving back and forth between the fire and the White House—the fucking White House!—to the point that I began feeling shitty about what we’d done; and even a little sick to my stomach. But then Fiona returned jingling Calvin’s keys and we were firing up his Mustang convertible, and the next thing I remember she was piloting us down 14th Street NW past buildings with Doric columns (now choked in prehistoric ivy) and a pair of grazing stegosaurus and at least one giant millipede; all the way to Constitution Avenue and the National Museum; which I took special note of only because I was trying not to look at her body—something she noticed, I’m sure, but didn’t seem to mind—because she just glanced at me beneath the blood red sky and smiled—toothily. Carnivorously.

IT WAS THE SORT OF thing you had to actually see; up close, personal—as up close and personal as the glass would allow, anyway—to fully appreciate; to fully understand that this was it, the flag that inspired the national anthem, the actual Fort McHenry garrison flag, a thing more than 40 feet high and maybe 30 feet long, laying at an angle in a climate-controlled black room, or a room that had been climate-controlled, until the Flashback, until the lights had gone out from Anchorage to Miami.

“Oh, say can you see,” I sang, moving my flashlight over the material, which was tattered and torn, “By the dawn’s early light ...”

I grinned and trailed off, letting the silence take control, letting the room buzz, and we just stood there.

“What so proudly we hailed,” sang Fiona at length, her voice cracking a little, “at the twilight’s last gleaming.” She took a breath in the dark. “Whose broad stripes and bright stars ... through the perilous fight ... O’er the ramparts we watched—were so gallantly streaming ...”

Then, together: “And the rocket’s red glare, the bombs bursting in air, gave proof through the night ... that our flag was still there.” We both took a breath. “Oh, say does that star-spangled ba-anner yet wave ... o’er the land of the free ... and the home ... of the ... brave.”

And again there was a silence, as perfect and deep as anything I’d ever experienced, either then or since.

“Fuck,” I said.

“Yeah,” said Fiona. “Fuck.”

I looked at the sparse starfield illuminated in her beam.

“They’re all gone,” I said, and lowered my flashlight. “Everyone who ever touched this. Those who first sowed it; those who stood in its shadow. Those who built this building to preserve it—all gone.”

“Yeah,” whispered Fiona. “It’s just us.”

“I don’t know, big sis—I mean ‘babe.’ But do you ever wonder if—like, we’re doing the right thing?”

“No.”

“Okay. Well. Why is that, exactly?”

“Because there is no right thing. I mean, maybe there was ... before the universe just—went bugfuck. Before everyone just vanished. But now? What’s right and what’s wrong, Leif? I mean, what could possibly make any difference—one way or the other?”

“I don’t know. It just seems that, like—”

“You’re sounding like Calvin; don’t go there. Because, I’m telling you, he’s not who you think he is. Not anymore. He’s—”

“Evolving?”

“Aging. Just aging. There’s a difference.”

“It’s going to happen,” I said. “We can’t stay teenagers for—”

“Can’t we?” She shook her head. “Maybe you don’t see yourself ... but I do. See you, that is. And let me tell you—you’re a fire.” She touched my hand where it gripped the sledgehammer. “And fires need to keep moving, keep consuming,” She raised my arm gently, assuredly, until I dropped my flashlight completely and took the hammer in both hands. “... or they burn out.”

And then I swung, harder than I ever had before, harder even than when I’d destroyed the china hutch, punching a white crater into the glass as big my head, causing cracks to spread out in rings, like a contagion, I thought, or a cancer, until I swung again and the head of the hammer smashed clean through, enough so that I had to fight to pull it back out, after which Fiona joined in and we smashed through the glass together, not all at once but blow after blow, until the bitter shards lay all around us and we fell to the flag’s faded cloth, kissing and groping each other with abandon, unfastening and working off each other’s clothes, fucking like it was the end of the world, which of course it was—consuming each other like paper in fire.

IT GOES WITHOUT SAYING that I was driving too fast; I was 15 and had just gotten laid. Add to that my inexperience—and a spike strip laid across the road—and, well, you probably have some idea how we ended up in the fountain of the Ronald Reagan Building with Old Glory folded up and sticking out of the trunk. All I know for certain is that we were both injured, Fiona seriously—to the extent that the blood from her head had fouled her left eye and she couldn’t stop shaking; which is how I noticed the figures approaching us from behind (I saw them in the rearview mirror when I removed Calvin’s doo-rag, to stop her bleeding).

“Fiona, listen—we—we gotta get out of here. Can you walk?”

“What is it?” she asked, weakly, deliriously, looking around like a blind person (which I suppose she was), bleeding profusely.

I squinted at the figures—there were more of them now—saw long beards and jackboots; rifles, riot gear, motorcycle helmets to which horns had been attached.

"Norsemen," I said. "Lots of them. Hold on."

I threw open my door and went around, noticing how exposed we were, how exposed the entrance to the building was.

"I'm going to put you across my back, okay? Just hang on."

"Okay."

"Here we go—"

And then I heaved her across my back and we went, hustling up 14th Street NW even as the Norsemen opened fire and the pavement sparked all around us—all the way to something called the M.I.M. Museum, the door of which I kicked in awkwardly before carrying Fiona up a flight of steps and laying her before a giant mural, after which I collapsed against the nearby wall—the window of which promptly exploded.

"Fuck!" I cursed, lying flat on my stomach, then crawled through the glass to Fiona where I shielded her lithe body with my own.

"It's okay, we're okay," I said quickly, even as she started to hyperventilate. "We're fine. They don't know we're not armed—they don't know we're not armed. They're not going to come in. Not yet."

I wrapped her in my arms and held her tight, even as the other windows were blown out and glass rained down. And then, just as suddenly as it had begun, it was over; at least for the moment—after which I lifted my head, slowly, cautiously, and listened.

Nothing. A squawk of a pterodactyl, maybe, way off in the distance.

"Leif?" managed Fiona, groggily. "Are you there?"

I squeezed her tightly, stunned that she couldn't feel it. "Shh-shhh," I said, stroking her hair, which was matted with blood, kissing her forehead.

At last a voice called, "We just want the girl. Give us the girl; vacate the House and the Mall, and we're done here. All right?"

I held Fiona close trying to still her trembling—realizing, in the process, that I was trembling myself. "Shhh—it's okay," I said, finding her hand, enveloping it in my own. "Everything is going to be okay."

"Aww, you're sweet," she said, her voice faint, papery. "But it's not. It never has been. You know that. Even before the Flashback."

"Shhh," I repeated, and diverted my eyes to the mural, which depicted, in stark black and white, seemingly all the atrocities human beings had ever committed—most of which I was unfamiliar with, the Holocaust and Hiroshima being obvious exceptions.

"They're right, you know," she said, softly, having followed my gaze. "The lights in the clouds. The shapes ... in that beautiful borealis, that came with the Flashback. They're right about us."

But I only stared at the painting, at the depictions of medieval torture and Mayan beheadings, at the lifeless, flattened cities and mounds of emaciated corpses, like driftwood; at the piles of skulls and perfect, white tombstones extending forever.

"... Right to have—how would they say it? To have 'cancelled' us." She laughed a little, which became a series of jagged coughs. "And Calvin ... Calvin is wrong. About you. About me. About everyone."

She shifted her head slightly, looking at the whole mural. "We ... we were meant to burn."

I angled my head to look at her; at the dark, smoldering eyes, the large, slightly mis-aligned teeth, even as she exhaled in a long, rattling breath, and just shrunk—like a bag with all the air sucked out; like a marionette lowered to the floor in an unrecognizable heap. After which I pressed my cheek to her own and just stayed that way, although for how long I couldn't possibly say. All I know is that I was 'awakened' by gunshots, by the crack-crack of small arms, followed by screaming; screaming and the instantly recognizable growls of dinosaurs—big ones, by the sound of it—which itself gave way to silence ... at which I knew, with a mixture of relief and anger (because it was too late for Fiona anyway), that the Norsemen were no more.

BY THE TIME I'D WALKED all the way back to the White House and the North Lawn—carrying Fiona's body on my shoulders—Calvin's announcement was well underway, although it came to an abrupt halt when I appeared near the scaffold and laid her at its feet; after which there were gasps followed by a hushed silence—that is, save for the ubiquitous crackling of the fire.

When at last Calvin spoke, he did so as someone who had already resigned himself to the harsh reality of her death, asking only if she had suffered, to which I responded, "No," and then inviting me to join him on the platform, which I did, climbing the rungs and taking his offered hand until we stood together over the crowd and the roaring pyre and he had turned to address his audience again.

"And so it goes," he said, simply, giving the moment time to breathe, allowing everyone to catch their breath, until someone unexpectedly shouted, "How did she die?" —at which he turned to me, humbly, impotently, I thought, and indicated I should step forward; which I did, stepping to the very edge of the platform and looking down at the flames and the upturned faces, liking the way it felt, liking the way it made my blood race and seemed to snap everything into focus, liking the sense of power and purpose.

"Norsemen," I said, bluntly, after which, having been a student of Calvin since before puberty, meaning I'd idolized him and observed him carefully in the hopes that I might one day be like him, I let the moment breathe—until, finally, I added, "They laid a trap ... and we blundered into it. And then they issued an ultimatum: Leave now. Leave, or die."

"Fuck them!" barked someone almost immediately, and was quickly joined by others—all of whom felt that retaliation should be swift as it was lethal.

"We outnumber them five to one! I say we do it now, while it's dark, and we have the element of surprise!"

At which Calvin quickly tugged me back and we changed places, so that I was standing behind him as he said, “Now wait just a minute, gang, just hold that line of thought. Because, see, the thing is, we are in their territory. All right? They warned us and we— well, we rightfully ignored them, because, as you say,” He pointed at one of the teenagers, “We outnumbered them. By about five to one, as you say. But that’s because we—we had a job to do. We had to come here and ... and burn what remained of the Old World, the old ways. But the Burning is done, don’t you understand? We’ve done what we set out to do, we’ve burned it fucking all!”

He looked left and right quickly, as though to fan the flames—taking them all in, seeking to build momentum. When no one spoke up he said, “And that’s why I think it’s time to ... to consider a new way. A new paradigm, as they say. A new, well, a new purpose. A way—”

“Our purpose is to burn!” shouted someone near the front, an expression which was met with cheers and sustained applause, and at least one horse whistle.

“Yes! Yes, it is!” Calvin shouted back, and hastened to add, “And so you have! So you have. And so very, very brightly, I might add. But there comes a time when ... when Time itself—begins to mutate. When your mind and your body begin to change, to evolve.”

“It’s called getting old!” someone shouted, and was met by laughter.

“It’s also called adapting; just bending ever so slightly so that instead of blowing you over the wind becomes an ally, a source of energy, and a renewable one at that. What I’m saying is ... the Burn is over. That the fields have been thoroughly cleansed and prepped. And that it’s time to ... to build again. It’s time to re-learn farming, irrigation, how to brew beer, for God’s sake! Because the keg—the keg eventually runs out. And that’s because what we’re doing here isn’t sustainable. It—it never was. But. But. You wanted a leader ... and somehow you found me. And so it was up to me in those first dark days to lift you up and to bolster your spirits, to channel your energy, to keep you busy and just get you through it.” He sounded fatherly, patriarchal. “To help you let go of what was—and will never be again.”

He turned toward me suddenly, I don’t know why. “So ... no. There will be no retaliation. Not against the Norsemen, nor any other group. And there will be no more destruction.” And then he held out his hand—I’m still not sure why—and I just looked at it; wondering if he knew, somehow—if he had intuited it. That Fiona and I had lain together; that I was beginning to doubt his wisdom and his leadership, just as she had. That’s when I noticed his hand was shaking slightly, as I had seen the hands of the very old and infirm do, and when I looked to his face I could see it—the age, the wear and tear, the lines just beginning to form around his eyes and his mouth, the hint of darkness just above his cheeks. But then he shook his hand as though urging me to take it and I did—grasping it firmly, assuredly—and we pulled each other into an embrace, a right bear hug, slapping each other on the back, seeming to acknowledge what we had in common, which, I was beginning to suspect, was a penchant for leadership. And Fiona.

But then I lifted my gaze over his shoulder—following the billowing embers, as I recall—and saw that great and terrible borealis in the sky and the dark shapes within it; saw the lights which shifted and bled in and out of each other and the alien colors which were not colors at all as we knew them but rather facets of some strange and inconceivable prism, and knew, even before I looked, that I would see those same colors in the eyes of the children below—the lost children, the children of the Flashback—just as I had seen them in the eyes of the dinosaurs which now ruled the earth. And more, that if I were to look, I’d see them in my own. And that’s when I slid the shard of glass out of my back pocket (the one I’d kept as a keepsake after making love to Fiona) and, clasping it in both hands—so that it cut me deep before anyone else—drove it into Calvin’s lower back.

At which Time stopped. It didn’t mutate; it didn’t evolve and transform—it just stopped; for I, and I alone, had stopped it. And then

I was jerking Calvin against me, violently, brutally, again and again, sinking the shard deep into his flesh, using it to impale his spine, until he began coughing up blood—which gurgled darkly in the twilight and for the briefest of moments made one giant bubble—before releasing him completely and letting him fall backward into the fire, where he impacted like a fresh log, causing embers to explode upward, and began screaming—hideously, obscenely. Briefly.

“Salud!” cried everyone below at once, raising their fists in solidarity, even as I looked at the sky yet again and considered what I saw there, and what I had seen of myself; as I considered what I had seen in the M.I.M. Museum and in Fiona’s dying eyes.

You wanted a fresh start, I said to them, the lights, the shapes within the lights. You wanted to cleanse away the old. Let us help you.

And then I looked at my friends, at my people, my tribe, seeing the Flashback in their eyes and knowing, at last, that this was its final expression; that we were meant to burn and to be burned, to end everything we’d ever touched; to end it all and to finally end ourselves. To just walk into the fire and close the book for good. To fertilize the fields for whatever was to come next.

To burn and to burn brightly.

To burn and to be burned, briefly.

Elegy

Okay, easy does it. Just nock your arrow—easy, easy, it's going to click—now put it in the rest ...

I looked at the allosaur as it fed, there in the slim shadow of the Mirage's entry arch, in the shimmering heat of Lost Vegas, and drew back the string—finding my anchor (which was just under my right ear), aligning the peephole with my sights.

Easy, easy ...

I stabilized the grip between my thumb and forefinger, sighting the area between the arms, the claws of which were covered in gore.

Great Spirit, thank you for sharing with me your glorious nature and abundant wildlife—

There was a thwish as I released the arrow.

Grant me always wisdom and respect in its pursuit—

Which struck the taupe-colored animal with a dull thump, causing it to rear up like a stallion, baying and squealing, barking at the sky.

And keep me ever humble in the harvest—

I nocked and released two more bolts, embedding them into its chest, into its great, beating heart.

So that I may be worthy of my place on this earth. Amen.

And it fell, the fast-acting microraptor venom locking its jaw, paralyzing its limbs, so that it squirmed briefly upon its belly before solidifying like stone (as though it had gazed upon Medusa herself) and lay still, at which Kesabe leapt from the palm bushes and bound toward it, barking and wagging his tail, and I followed, grateful for the meat yet distressed by the loss of the arrows—which I knew would never be recovered—and overall preoccupied enough that I didn't even notice the girl standing just beyond the kill—until she yelped once, taking me in, and bolted out of sight down S. Las Vegas Blvd; after which I heard a small engine sputter to life and begin to rev.

"Sic, Kesabe!" I barked, for she was the first person we'd seen since San Diego—but the Dutch Shepherd was already on it, leaping over the allosaur's tail and sprinting after her even as I shouldered the compound bow and fetched Blucifer, whom I mounted quickly, gracelessly, before cracking the reins and giving chase.

And then there we were, she on her motor scooter (which sputtered and whined and left a trail of oily blue smoke) while we pursued, weaving between empty cars, maneuvering around stalled buses, racing down the Strip past Harrah's and Caesar's and the rows of transplanted palm trees—all the way to Planet Hollywood and a wide set of stairs (which she attempted to navigate but failed); all the way until Kesabe fell upon her like a threshing machine and I at last trotted to a halt, calling him off.

Fortunately, she hadn't been hurt, at least not seriously: she had a few nicks from Kesabe's teeth—a given—along with some minor cuts and bruises, but that was it. She was, however, pinned beneath her scooter; a circumstance she could do virtually nothing about—considering Kesabe's close proximity.

"Bastard!" she cursed—her voice full of venom—and spat at me. "What do you want?"

I recoiled as though slapped in the face, as though her small voice were instead the loudest thing in the world (which, at that time and place, now that I think about it, it was). And then the silence reasserted itself, as total and sublime as anything since Death Valley—only worse, for I now had something to compare it to—and because I was a man, and alone, with no rules to govern me, and because I'd heard nothing but death birds since the Cleveland National Forest, I decided I would not just slake my curiosity and let her go (who she was, where she was from, what did she know) but that in fact I would keep her, as a bound prisoner if necessary. In part this was to protect her, for she wouldn't last long with no weapons and no guile, but mainly it was for myself. Because, having heard her voice once, I intended to keep hearing it.

I needed to keep hearing it.

BY THE TIME I'D ESTABLISHED a camp in the covered breeze-way of the Luxor obelisk—"Cleopatra's Needle" it was called, at least according to a bronze placard on its wall—and bound her hands and feet, the sun had set and a slight rain had started to fall; something I fully welcomed after so much time in the desert. As to whether the girl welcomed it also, who could say. For even though I set her near the opening (as well as the fire) and provided her my own bedroll to sit on, she only continued to glare—probably due to us eating in front of her; for I had decided, though you might think it cruel, that I would starve her into speaking, if necessary. Which, of course, she finally did—speak, that is—although only after a considerable time, saying, hoarsely, yet clearly, assertively, "Is this some kind of torture? I mean, don't you have to feed prisoners before killing them? Isn't that what the Geneva Convention says?"

I looked at her through the flames, saying nothing, even as Kesabe snarled.

At length I carved a piece of meat from the spit and dropped it on a paper plate, which I carried around to her—but didn't hand over. Instead, I knelt and sliced off a single bite-sized morsel—then held it close to her nose.

"Trade," I said, matter-of-factly. "One bite per something about you. It can be your name. Where you're from. How you've survived ... Just talk."

She started to protest but hesitated, searching my eyes, trying to judge intent. At last she said, "So what's with the war paint?"

I stood and began to walk away.

"Wait a minute—wait a minute—jeez, so we don't go there—fine. My name is ... it's Essie, all right? Essie McIntyre. I'm from Spokane."

I paused, looking over my shoulder. "Where?"

"Spokane. It—it's a city. In Washington."

"... D.C.?"

"State. Washington State."

I returned and crouched near her again. "Okay. So ... how'd you get to be here?"

She didn't say anything—only opened her mouth wide.

"It—it's got an aftertaste ... just so you know." I fed her the piece of allosaur.

She chewed it up eagerly, voraciously—before pausing, making a face.

"It's the game," I said. "You have to get used to it."

"It's not that. It's just ..." She swallowed slowly, tentatively. "I had alligator once, in New Orleans—this, this reminds me of that. Only heavier, oilier. With an acrid aftertaste."

"That's the predator in it ... at least that's what they say." I cut her off another piece. "Would—would you like some more?"

"Yes, I think so, please. It's not terrible."

I fed her the piece from the end of my knife.

"What, what was the question?" She finished chewing and swallowed. "Oh, yes. How did I come to be here. Well, that's just it—" She paused suddenly and tilted her head. "Can I ask you something?"

I must have looked confused.

"Just one," she said, and tried to smile. "What is your name?"

There was a pregnant pause as I thought about it. It seemed only fair. "Satanta," I said, and cut her another piece. "Satanta—the Last."

"Satanta, the Last," she repeated, and shrugged. "Okay. Thanks. Guess I figured you weren't a Brad." She opened her mouth wide, waiting for the next morsel, but relented when I shook my head. "Right. So—how I came to be here. Well, see, that's the conundrum, isn't it? Because the fact is—I don't know."

I squinted, unsure how to take that. "What do you mean?"

"Again, I'm sure I don't know. Only that ... I was at a stoplight—in Spokane—watching a stormfront roll in, when the news starting talking about, well, power outages, mostly, but also that people were going missing—I mean, not just one or two, say, over the course of weeks or even days, but, dozens of people, maybe hundreds, all at once, as though they'd never even existed. And I was just sort of wrapping my head around that, or trying to, when I noticed there were ... lights in the clouds. Shapes. Things that were above me at that point and seeming almost to ... to be looking down at me. To be targeting me. Me—on my little motor scooter—somewhere in the Spokane Valley.” She laughed. “And the next thing I knew I was here,” She indicated the Strip. “Scooter and all—just sort of dumped over on my side at Circus, Circus, and feeling ... almost as though I'd been tasked with something. As though there was something I was supposed to do. Though what it was I couldn't remember—and still can't, no matter how hard I try.”

I'm afraid I just looked at her. What was there to say, exactly? That what she had described was impossible? That even though most the world's population had vanished and the dinosaurs had returned—an impossibility itself, but something we had accepted—her blacking out in one place and waking up in another was ridiculous?

“You should eat,” I said, offering her more meat. “No more questions.”

She pulled the flesh off the fork with her teeth and chewed, her eyes never leaving mine. “I have some,” she said, talking around her food, “Questions, that is. Like, what the hell brought you here? And where do you get off on kidnapping me?”

I paused, knife in hand, as the fire crackled and popped.

“I—I came to sift ashes,” I said—quietly, obliquely—but did not elaborate.

“You came ... to sift ashes,” she said, and nodded once, twice. “Okay. I'll play. Why not. And these ashes are here, in Las Vegas?”

“In the suburbs, yes. On Canosa Avenue. It—it's all so foggy. I haven't been back for a very long time. But I'll know the way once I find the gas station.”

“The gas station.”

I nodded. “The one on the corner. The RGB. If it's still there.”

"I see. And—and what do you plan to do with me?"

I looked at her in the firelight—at her auburn hair, which blazed in the fire's glow, and her green eyes, which caught the light and glimmered. "It is my wish that I should continue hearing your voice," I said.

She peered at me intensely, glimmeringly, as though she'd won some sort of victory. "Is that so?" Then she laughed, brusquely, boorishly, and held up her bound wrists. "Well, then. I guess you better start cutting, Chief. Wouldn't you say?"

"YOU'RE A REAL ASSHOLE, Satanta. Just so we're clear."

I turned around and looked up, shielding my eyes from the sun, and saw her glaring at me from Blucifer's saddle (to which I'd bound her with zip ties), before jerking the rein, tugging them after me.

"And here I thought you were different—if only for a minute," she continued. "Boy, was I wrong!"

"And I thought you were—how did you say it? On a speech strike," I said.

"I am," she snapped. "I just needed to say that one thing. Again."

We clip-clopped up S. Las Vegas Blvd, past the fairgrounds and a gaudy strip mall called the Bonanza, saying nothing, during which I found myself gazing at the sky lights—our ubiquitous friends since the Flashback—and noting how angry they seemed today, how inflamed; and noting, too, that Kesabe had not circled back in some time (for it was his tradition to run far ahead), a fact which was beginning to trouble me.

That's when I heard the strange sound: a kind of forlorn mewing, like the note of a horn being drug out too long, coming from just around the corner, just beyond the liquor store—and paused, holding up my hand.

"What? What's going on?"

I waved her into silence, dropping the rein, then hustled to the edge of the building—where, after peeking around the corner, I saw a juvenile sauropod of the Diplodocus family (meaning it was the size of a typical school bus) collapsed in the middle of the street—its right front leg stuck in a manhole.

“What is it? What do you see?”

I looked from the sauropod to the corner of a nearby building, where something had moved, then across the street to an overgrown alley. Yes, I thought. There. And there. Between the tattoo parlor and the marijuana dispensary ...

“Allosaurs,” I said, gravely. “An entire pack of them. In desert camouflage. They—they’ve got something trapped.”

“Omigod. It—it’s not your dog, is it?”

I returned and picked up the rein, began leading Blucifer forward, into the intersection. “No.”

“Wait ... what are you—”

“We’re going through,” I said.

“But what if those things—”

“They don’t care about us; they want the bigger game. For now. Just hold on.”

The horse’s hooves went clip-clop, clip-clop as we passed, the bluish-gray sauropod coming into full view ...

A moment later she said, “It—it’s stuck. In the manhole. Do you see that?”

I eyed the predators warily, continuing to lead. “There’s nothing we can do about it.”

“But she’ll be helpless against—”

“That is the way of it,” I insisted. “The way of the—”

“Look, would you stop with the Indian clap-trap? I’m not even sure—”

There was a thwomp as the allosaur by the building leapt into the road—not by us but about fifty feet away, near the sauropod.

"Jesus, can't you do anything? What about your bow?"

"And risk bringing them down on us?" I intensified our pace, sprinting toward the Stratosphere. "No!"

And then they were coming—the allosaurs from across the street—passing so close we could smell the meat on their breath; closing in on the frightened herbivore ... until we passed the scene completely and sought refuge in a nearby gas station (its storefront had long since collapsed) and gathered there trembling as the sauropod cried out—for it wouldn't be long now until they fell upon her.

"Jesus," said Essie, listening. "What a world."

"Yes," I said, remembering. "My father used to say it had a demonic sublime; every tree and every rock, every animal, including man, down to the lowest insect." I listened as the sauropod moaned, seeming already to give up, to resign its fate. "And yet."

"What do you mean?"

"What?"

"You said, 'and yet.' What did you mean?"

I unshouldered the compound bow—rubbing my aching deltoid, stretching my arm. "Nothing. It's just that ... maybe it doesn't have to be this way."

When she didn't respond I looked at her—found her already looking at me: calmly, meditatively, her eyes seeming to glimmer. "I'm sure I don't know what you mean."

"I mean ... that I could end it. Her confusion and terror. That I—could prevent her from suffering." I looked at the bow and the dark, poisoned bolts attached to it. "That it's in my hands to do so."

"A mercy killing, then. Is that what you mean?"

"Yes," I said.

She seemed to think about it. "Well, you know, you'd have to expose yourself first—in order to take the shot. And there's always the risk they might turn on you. Is that—is that a risk you're willing to take? And if so ... why? How would it benefit you—or us?"

I stared at her, confused by the change. “Look, just a minute ago you were—”

“Just a minute ago I was participating,” she said, sounding cold, analytical. “Now I’m observing. And I’ll ask you again ... why? What could it possibly change?”

I gripped my bow and thought about that, wondering what had come over her, and why her eyes seemed to dance, to shine—as though they’d been illuminated from within.

At last I said, “Jesus. Maybe because we’re still human?”

And then I was moving: stepping over the overgrown rubble, hurrying around the nearby buildings; dropping to one knee near the alligators where I sighted the mewing diplodocus and released two arrows, one after the other, into the soft tissue of her eye orbit, killing her instantly—after which the predators fell upon her like wolves, snarling and clawing, opening her like a bag of sausage, tearing out her throat ... as I walked back to the station and was greeted by Kesabe, barking and licking my hand. As I looked at Essie and found her returned to normal, seeming almost not to know what had happened.

As she indicated the orange Union 76 sign and said, in her usual tone of voice, “So would this happen to be it? Your gas station?”

After which I looked around in a daze—recognizing the soda fountain (now an antique) with the American bald eagle on top; recognizing the wooden Indian which stood by the door—and knowing, at last, that I had found my way home.

“IT—IT’S NOT WHAT I expected,” said Essie over my shoulder, as Blucifer whinnied and Kesabe pissed on the nearest tree; as the overgrown rancher sat—its nearly flat roof baking in the sun ... its slat fence partially collapsed.

“It’s not a teepee; if that’s what you mean,” I said, and dismounted.

"I didn't expect a teepee," said Essie, as I helped her down. "It's just that—it's so white. Like Wally and the Beav are gonna come running out any minute."

"My father didn't believe in reservations," I said, leading Blucifer to a bush, abandoning the reins. "He thought they were museums full of defeated people; just so many relics, withering in the sun. He wouldn't even take us there to visit our grandparents; they had to come to us."

"That must have sucked."

"No, actually—it really didn't," I gripped the doorknob and paused, wondering if I was really up to it; if I was fully prepared for what I might find. "It taught us—my brother and I—to see ourselves as individuals, not a collective—and a defeated one at that. Maybe that's why neither of us wound up pickled in Thunderbird."

I twisted the knob and eased the door open, watching sunlight spill across the floor, then stepped in slowly, cautiously. "He didn't buy the idea that land could be any sort of birthright, said living things had always competed for resources and always would, and that, change being the only constant, to deny that was to deny the fundamental nature of reality."

I paused in front of a framed picture of my mother, touching it gently, tracing a finger through the dust. "He always said, 'Should I apologize for winning your mother from a white man?'"

I laughed a little, and so did Essie.

"No, of course not," he'd say. "Because that's what nature does, it conflicts. It competes."

I stared at the picture, hoping it had been painless for them and that they had just vanished like so many others. Hoping they had gone together.

"Well, that explains that," said Essie. She had leaned in and was examining my face.

I must have looked confused.

"Your war paint," she said. "It's red and white."

And I had to laugh; because she was exactly right, even though I had never thought about it—had never even considered it, at least not consciously—after which, feeling cavalier, I said, “My real name is Steve, by the way. At least, that’s what my mother used to call me.”

She paused, looking at me with something like pity. “Steve.”

“Yeah. It—it means victor—”

“I’m gonna stick with Satanta. If you don’t mind.”

“Sure,” I said, and shrugged. “I prefer it. More apocalyptic.”

And then we moved on, picking our way through the overgrown house (liberating a stack of photo albums along the way as well as my mother’s Polaroid camera), after which we came to my old bedroom—the roof of which had collapsed so that the palm trees were visible outside—and sat on the bed.

“You had a beautiful life,” said Essie at length— perusing the photos, turning the pages. “You were very lucky.”

“I know,” I said.

“Not everyone is.”

“I know that, too.”

I peeled the plastic coating from one of the sheets and removed a picture, staring at it in the late afternoon sun, in the burnt ochre wash of what photographers called the Golden Hour. “That was us—my entire family—at Disneyland; in Anaheim—must have been about ’78 or ’79. I can tell by the hair.”

She leaned close to examine it, her own hair tickling my cheek. “Hard to believe that’s you. Mercy. You had prettier locks than I did. So did your brother.”

I rubbed the Polaroid between my thumb and forefinger, slowly, absently. “All dust,” I said quietly. “Everything in the picture, both the red and the white.” I laid back on the bed, feeling suddenly tired.

“Nonsense,” she said—and, to my astonishment, laid down next me. “You seem alive enough to me.”

And then she began to doze—or so it seemed to me—and it was just myself and the queer lights: which glowed all of a color and showed nothing of their usual chaotic rhythms, but only looked down on us softly, ambiently, like Christmas lights hung from the very firmaments; serene.

IF NOT FOR HER HAVING taken off her over-shirt during the night, we would never have found her—for it was only after giving it to Kesabe and having him sniff it that the Dutch Shepherd was able to track her: a trail which had led straight to the gas station and the allosaurs from the day before—not to mention Essie herself; who stood trembling yet defiant amongst the ruins and seemed almost to be goading the animals on, daring them to attack.

“Essie! Good God, Essie!” I shouted, fighting the reins, as Blucifer—panicked by the predators—leapt and circled and whinnied, kicking up dust. “What have you done?”

“Oh, don’t you see? We had no right! No right at all!”

I dismounted quickly—having wrested Blucifer into submission only briefly, for he snorted and charged away even as I found my footing—un-shouldering my bow as fast as I could, nocking a bolt. “Back up into the store, dammit; do it, now! Why, for God’s sake?”

But she only held her ground—even as the sky strobed and flashed and the clouds roiled with thunder—her feet planted firmly; her arms held wide. “But don’t you see it? Oh, how can you not see it? Look into my eyes, Satanta. Look into my eyes and tell me you don’t understand ...”

I sighted the animal nearest her and released an arrow, Thwish!—which struck the beast in its eye and dropped it, instantly, even as Kesabe barked and snarled and the others seemed to zero in on me.

“Look at me, Satanta. Slay ... me. Because they are in me, now, fully manifest. They—who have caused all the suffering. They, the very archi-pects of the Flashback. And I want them to feel it. Oh, can't you understand? I want them feel what it is they have wrought!"

I caught a fleeting glimpse of her before the remaining allosaurs attacked: saw the eyes like a fire in the sky and the fallow skin shot through with green—until the animals charged and I loosed another bolt, dropping one as it ran, and yet leaving two, both of which would have fallen on me if Kesabe hadn't leapt into the fray like a pointy-eared threshing machine, barking and biting, scratching and snarling, peeling the predator away, as the other bit for my neck and I dodged, leaping onto its back; then stabbed it with an arrow again and again, hanging on as it leapt and bucked, groping for its eyes (which I would have gouged out had it not fallen), thanking the Great Spirit as it shuddered and died.

And yet I'd barely had time to climb off it when I heard Essie scream—not from the store's rubble but high above it, in the sky—where a pterodactyl wheeled like a kite in the sun even while gripping her like a ragdoll and beaking her as if with a sword—that is until it too was attacked by another, bigger bird—at which I snatched up my bow and nocked my last arrow, aiming into the flail of talons and wings, and shot the first bird clean through its skull.

And then it was over, or nearly so, as the thing fluttered down and dropped her; at which I ran to her and cradled her in my arms even as the bird next to us thrashed and died.

"They felt it," she gasped, "I know they did. They felt it through me."

"Shhh," I said, "Save your strength. We have to get you—"

"They thought they could just see through my eyes—that they could observe us that way, study us ..." She coughed violently—shudderingly—hacking up blood. "But what they didn't know was that they'd feel through me too. Feel it all, Satanta ..." She groped for my hand and found it, began to squeeze. "The pain ... the terror. But also the compassion. The mercy. Like the kind you showed the herbivore.

The kind—” She seized up suddenly as though her insides were being torn apart. “The kind you showed me. That—that we showed each other. And for the briefest of moments ... they understood. Go—go north, okay? You’ll find people there, good people. I know—because they know. Our watchers. Our destroyers. I have been in their minds. Go north. But first ... first help your ...”

And she died.

I closed her eyes. And that’s when it hit me how quiet it was, and that I could no longer hear Kesabe barking—that indeed, I could no longer hear him at all.

MY GRANDFATHER ONCE said, in response to my father, “We all live on reservations, some of us just don’t know it yet.” And though I didn’t understand that then, I was pretty sure—as I stood over my friends’ graves and watched the house go up in flames—that I did now; for he’d been talking about our limitations and the fact of our own mortality (trying to tell me, I think, as I got ready to leave for Los Angeles more than 30 years ago, that if I were going there to escape I was in for a disappointment). All I know for certain is that as I stood there over the crude markers—one for Essie and one for Kesabe—I felt smaller and less significant than ever before (and I’d felt pretty small and insignificant since the Flashback), to the point that I questioned going on at all, north or otherwise. But then Blucifer showed up with a familiar snort and whinny—where he’d gone I didn’t know, nor did I ask—after which, feeding him what remained of the oats in my pocket, I decided we would head back to the coast and follow it north, for maybe there were people there, ‘good people,’ as Essie had said, and if that were true, then, truly, anything was possible.

Even so I hesitated—even after mounting and slinging the bow across my back (for I hoped to find arrows before leaving the city entirely), thinking on Essie, whom I had come to love even though I’d known her only for a short time, and on my friend, Kesabe (whom I'd named 'Kemosabe' but had shortened to 'Kesabe') ... a dog who had just been a dog but thought he was a wolf; and who—as evidenced by his final act—sometimes was, sometimes was.

Like you, maybe? I wondered, and laughed. Satanta the Last—come Steve? And yet wasn't it at least partially true? For the Flashback made of you only what you already were—however veiled that may have been in the world before.

And then I snapped the reins and we went, Blucifer and I—back toward the coast and the passage north. Back to the winding trail, which, like all winding trails, went everywhere and nowhere at once.

The Low Rumble of Distant Thunder

The cloud was like a wave, and yet not like a wave, like a storm, yet not like any storm we had seen (not since the initial Flashback, at least). Nor, in truth, could we be sure it was a cloud; for such was the distance that it remained as elusive and ephemeral—or nearly so—as when Maria had first noticed it: there beyond the cornfields near Sioux City, Nebraska (now an ashen necropolis); there beyond what had been our home before the arrival of the Flashback—but which now stood only as a gravestone and a cenotaph, a monument to the dead.

I looked at Caleb, who was still grinding the binoculars—peering at the racetrack. “Well? What do you see?”

He scanned left to right, slowly. “People,” he said, adjusting the focusing ring. “Lots and lots of them. The stands are almost full.”

When he didn’t elaborate, Maria said: “Okay—but what are they doing? I mean, what’s on the field?”

“Nothing,” he said. “Nothing I can see. Not yet.” He worked the ring with his index finger furiously. “I can’t tell if it’s a horse track or a dog track or—wait; okay, I can see enclosures now, horse-sized. They’re—they’re connected to the stables. That’s weird ...”

“What?”

“It’s like they’re armored. Just really heavily-fortified,” He handed me the binoculars. “See for yourself.”

I pressed the rubber eyepieces against my brow and squinted, scanning the track, locating the enclosures. “Yeah, that is odd. Looks jury-rigged. Like they just sort of started welding plates on willy-nilly one day. And there’s something else, almost like—”

I focused on a shape near the stalls that looked like a large steel cutout, which was attached to—

“Is that, like, a mechanical rabbit? With something attached?”

I handed the binoculars off to Caleb—but Maria quickly snatched them away.

“My father used to take me to the races all the time. Horses and greyhounds, if you don’t mind.” She peered through the glasses intently

(which were huge in relation to her head). “And there’s no way a horse track would ever have—”

But then there was a gunshot (or a recording of one; it was difficult to say from where we crouched on the hill) and the shape began moving—a shape we could now tell was that of a dinosaur, a gallimimus, to be precise—accelerating rapidly, wobbling precariously, as the gates of the enclosures banged open and the animals within burst free (revealing themselves not as eager thoroughbreds or even whipcord greyhounds but therapod dinosaurs of the Allosauridae family, juveniles, based on their size), who sprinted after the decoy like green cheetahs even as we looked on in disbelief and the stands erupted in applause; as the lights came on all over the stadium (impossible in and of itself) and a great neon sign flickered to life which read: WELCOME TO CHECKERED FLAGS; as darkness continued to fall and the cloud which was not a cloud—the very same we had been fleeing ever since dead Sioux City—continued to come, flashing, pulsating, rumbling.

As something moved at the corner of my vision and I turned: in time to see a man swinging a baseball bat directly at my head—after which, not surprisingly, there was a void black as night.

“... HEY, I SAID. HEY THERE. Are you okay?”

A voice, neither Caleb’s nor Maria’s, somewhere in the void, somewhere in the blackness.

“It—it was Luther, wasn’t it? Uses a baseball bat—isn’t that right? Hey there ...”

I blinked, trying to focus, saw a fleshy blur which resolved itself into a face; a face wedged between the bars of a—

I sat up with a start, hair clinging to my face and clothes, dangling from my hair. “Where in the hell?”

“Shhh,” said Caleb, indicating I should look to my right, into a cage containing a single allosaur, which stood on one leg like a green flamingo, the other tucked beneath its great, bulbous belly, and seemed to sleep, fitfully. “I think we’re safe; the bars seem pretty solid. But I’d rather not put them to the test, if you know what I mean.”

Maria moaned as she sat up and rubbed her head. “Jesus, what hit us? Last thing I remember we—” She looked back and forth groggily between the allosaur on our right and the stranger to our left. “Where—where on earth are we?”

“I, ah, I can speak to that,” said the stranger. “Although you may not like what I have to say. As for our scaly friend, well, while I am sure he would be happy to dine on us—you needn’t worry. He has spent his entire life in that cage and would never challenge it. I’m Harry, by the way. Harry Hawkins.”

We all turned and looked at him.

“Paul,” I said. “Paul Barrett. This is Maria. And that’s Caleb.”

He pointed at each one of us in turn. “Paul, Maria, Caleb. How do. Well, then. Welcome to Checkered Flags—possibly the last place on earth you’d want to be. People are happy here; if your definition of ‘happy’ is waiting in line for peanut butter and rice and maybe a ladle full of water. And this, mind you, while Rudy De Santo practically swims in it. Up there,” He nodded, possibly at the elevated restaurant we’d observed earlier (at least that’s what it had looked like). “In his ‘Winner’s Circle.’”

“I—I guess I don’t get it,” I said, unsure what he was trying to say. “I mean, if this—De Santo—is hoarding all the resources, why don’t you just—”

“There’s someone coming,” said Caleb, after which everyone faced forward—in time to see a lithe form slink past the bars: a woman, coming to see Harry Hawkins. A woman with whom he began whispering heatedly.

I leaned close to the bars and listened, catching only snippets: something about the next race and the uppermost row of the bleachers

... about decapitating the snake, and a future free of want. Then she was gone and he had turned his attention back to us.

“You were saying? Ah, yes. Why don’t we just—what? Take our fair share? Eliminate him, perhaps, so that we may divvy things up as we please? Nay, that’s all well and good, but how does one do this when he is surrounded by bodyguards both day and night? Or when trying and failing would result not just in your own disappearance, but that of your family and friends, your associates, even your casual acquaintances?”

I was beginning to see his point. And yet—

“There must be some way to get through to him,” I said.

“Short of a bayonet to the throat? I don’t see it.” He peered out at the stables, his eyes distant and glassy. “No. All that’s important to him are these races. And betting on these infernal iguanas.”

“Infernal? Iguanas?” —a voice, coming from the front of the cages, from the man with the bat himself; what had Harry called him? Luther. “Is that any way to talk about Rudy’s Finest?” He looked at the allosaur next to us, then over his beefy shoulder—into the vespertine dark. “Did you hear that, Caligula? How about you, Lovely Bones? Man says you’re ‘infernal.’ Calls you ‘iguanas.’ Now, you tell me: is that any way to talk just before dinner?” He looked at each of us in turn. “It’s feeding time, you understand. Winner gets raw meat.” His eyes landed on Hawkins. “Isn’t that right, Harry?”

“No—no, I’m sure it isn’t,” stammered Harry. “Because—we’re fresh out of livestock. Along with everything else. And that’s ... That’s—” The color drained from his face even as Luther began to unlock his cage. “You can’t be serious. Not even De Santo—”

But they were already moving—Luther and his men—piling into his stall even as he desperately tried to elude them; counting and grunting as they heaved him above their heads; pitching him, as he fought and flayed and screamed, into the awakened allosaur’s cage—where he vanished behind the partial wall only to rise again a moment later; as a red-black fountain of blood.

After which—calmly, deliberately, nonchalantly—Luther opened our own stall door; and said, not-unkindly: “By the way—you’re invited to dinner. All of you. In the Winner’s Circle. Follow me.”

And then he was gone.

AS IT TURNED OUT, THE “Winner’s Circle” was the restaurant we’d observed earlier (a curious affair, indeed, for it was as if someone had chopped the legs off Seattle’s Space Needle and simply mounted it above the bleachers, antennae, beacon and all). Nor could it be said that it—or our escorts—were unaccommodating; indeed, we were treated only with respect as they led us through its luxurious appointments and seated us, at last, across from De Santo himself (I knew it was he because he wore a polyester suit and yellow-tinted glasses—as well as a white cowboy hat as big as a serving tray—and who but the person in charge would dress such as that?). Neither was he alone, for Luther sat on his left side while someone I can only refer to as The Jockey (as he remained silent throughout the occasion and was dressed in full racing gear) sat on his right. And then we all waited—in a bonafide perfect storm of awkwardness—as drinks were brought and appetizers served, until De Santo sat back in his chair suddenly (which was more like a throne), and said, lackadaisically, “Okay—why not? I’ll bite. Why has Hanover—with whom we’ve shared a perfect peace since the start of the Flashback, and, also, with whom we’ve never even exchanged an angry word—suddenly decided to start sending us, well, spies? Take all the time you need. Take your time—but don’t waste mine. Go.”

I glanced at Maria and Caleb, who looked as bewildered as I was. Hanover? As in Hanover Field?

"We—we passed an airport called that," I said, "right before we found you. Is that what you mean? There wasn't anyone there. In fact, it was completely abandoned."

Luther stiffened—as though he might pounce upon me at any moment—but was quickly quelled by De Santo, who gently tapped the table in front of him. "I warn you, Mr. Barrett—you insult my intelligence at your own risk."

I must have looked surprised.

"Oh, don't look so shocked; of course we were listening in on you. How else were we to determine your motives? I must say, however: we gleaned precious little before Luther arrived—too early."

The two exchanged uncomfortable glances even as I cleared my throat to continue.

At last I said, "I would not lie about something so easy to disprove; nor risk all our lives in such a vain effort to deceive. Be assured—Hanover Field has been abandoned. Be assured, also, that the reason for its abandonment is clear: something is coming. Something we've observed for several days, but which Hanover, having aircraft, would have observed much sooner. Call it a cloud, a storm front, whatever it is you like. Call it another Flashback. But know this and know it well: it is coming. And you may not like what it brings. You may not like it at all."

And then I waited—waited as the three of them, De Santo, Luther, and the Jockey, glanced at each other and seemed to talk it over (without ever saying a word); waited as Caleb, Maria, and myself did the same. And I suppose my optimism that De Santo could be reached—although how I could think that after what had happened in the stables remains a mystery to me even today—got the better of me, because I was genuinely surprised when he said, simply, after a brief but pregnant pause, "Looks like rain, as they say." —before completely shrugging it off. "It's a dirt track—it shouldn't affect the race. And now if you're done with all this ... I'd like to make a proposal. That is, if you're curious at all as to what we intend to do with you?"

I'm afraid I could only stare at him in vexed disbelief.

"Really, Mr. Barrett. But what did you expect? That, on the word of a spy, I would just pull up stakes and abandon everything we have fought so hard to achieve here? That I would just—hand it over to you, and in the process displace, maybe, 2,000 people? My people?"

Caleb sneered. "You don't give a shit about these people. You heard our conversation with Hawkins—"

The table jolted, rattling the silverware, as Luther started to stand—only to be intercepted by De Santo, who encouraged him to sit.

"Easy, easy," said De Santo, patting him on the back, cajoling him. And to us: "Now look what you've done; you've upset Luther." He dabbed at some spilled water with a napkin and otherwise tidied. "You have to understand—it's Caleb, isn't that correct?—that Harry ... oh, dear, Harry ... was a bit of a disgruntled employee. He used to work in the stables, you know, although I don't recall him telling you that. The problem, of course, is that he was no good at it—had no knack for the animals—nor, and this is the important part, had he any love for the Race. And what you must understand about Checkered Flags, even if you understand nothing else, is that here, at last, the Race is everything."

He licked his lips as though to savor the idea, and his green eyes twinkled. "It drives everything, you see. Decides everything. It will even decide what we do with you."

I had been looking at Caleb since he'd first spoken up—now I refocused on De Santo. "What do you mean?"

He sat back and smiled, smugly, over-confidently. "I mean the next competition—what we here in the Winner's Circle call the Post-dinner Dash—which will start in, say," He consulted his watch. "45 minutes? It involves you."

I glanced at Maria and Caleb—who only stared back at me, gravely—then again to De Santo. “What the hell are you talking about? What does that even mean?”

“It means four contestants in a win-only race: Caligula, Lovely Bones, Bromtide, and Mesozoic Nights. It means, Mr. Barrett, that you will place a bet; collectively, on one of the animals—truly, whichever you like—for a winner’s purse ... the contents of which will be your unqualified freedom.”

He lifted his glass of wine and sipped, daintily, as we looked on.

“Likewise, should you lose—well, let’s just say, you’ll be joining Mr. Hawkins. By the way—Luther. What ever happened to Harry?”

“He had sort of a falling out—with Mesozoic Nights. Seemed like there was some sort of beef between the two.”

“Ah—well,” said De Santo. “There you go.” He looked straight at me—again, I have no idea why. “Loser loses all. So. Any questions?”

“I have some,” said Maria, curtly, coldly, all business. “The first is: How can we be expected to place bets on animals that we know nothing about?”

I’m pretty sure Caleb and I just looked at her.

“And the second is: I counted three adolescent allosaurs present in the stables—one next to us and two across—not four. All of which begs the question: Where is the other one? And why is he being treated differently from the rest?”

Nobody said anything—for several breaths, at least.

“Ah, yes,” said De Santo after some length, “you mean Bromtide. Well, that’s the wild card, isn’t it? Because, you see, Bromtide isn’t a dinosaur ... he’s a horse.”

I looked at him quizzically and then at The Jockey, who just nodded, like he was fucking Boba Fett or something.

“As to the background of the animals, you’ll find it all right here,” He pushed a leather-bound binder toward us—I had assumed it was a menu. “Race results, pedigree, notes on health and temperament, it’s really quite comprehensive. You'll even be left alone with it—before the race, that is—after which you'll dog-ear a profile and kindly leave it on the table, yes?"

Nobody said anything as we stared at the book.

At last I said, "And you're just going to pretend that cloud, or whatever it is, doesn't exist ..."

"Ah, that. Yes—bromtide. The low rumble of distant thunder. Like those rumors of an uprising, I suppose. Or my attempted assassination."

"I should think that would concern you," I said.

He tucked a napkin into his shirt as dinner was served. "You know what my father used to say? He said, 'Rudy, there's but two kinds of people in the world: those that are players, and those that are spectators. Don't ever let me catch you being a spectator.'"

He cocked his head as the plates were set down, seeming to study me. "You know what else? He said the worst thing about Hell is that you could still see Heaven, up there, just beyond the firmament, forever out of reach. Now—what do you suppose he meant by that?"

I stared at him numbly, utterly bewildered.

"I didn't know either—and still don't. It was just shit my dad said."

And then we ate—quickly, silently—and he left, followed immediately by The Jockey and then Luther, who remained just outside the door, watching us, guarding us.

I'LL CONFESS I JUMPED when the starting pistol fired—which seemed inordinately loud even from the top of the bleachers—mainly because I'd turned around to look at the cloud, which had doubled in size and now claimed nearly one quarter of the sky—spreading across it like a cancer, pulsing and flashing from deep inside.

"And here they go! They're on their way down the stretch. The break was good; every animal got a clean shot out of the gate. And as they come down here to the eighth pole, it is Mesozoic Nights and Caligula ...”

I peered at the announcer’s booth, wondering once again what they were using for power, and so much of it—the stadium lights alone would have overwhelmed most generators. But then Maria nudged me and I focused on the action—seeing, to my horror, that Bromtide had already fallen behind; Bromtide, whom we had unanimously voted to support.

“Caligula is trying to force his way to the front and doing a good job of it as they pass the stands. Here on the outside comes Lovely Bones, in a good position. And as they go by me it is Caligula on the lead by one length. Caligula has the lead and then comes Mesozoic Nights in second place right along beside him. Going into the first turn is Caligula by a length. Mesozoic Nights is second and on the outside of him is Lovely Bones. Far back in the crowd, on the inside, in about fourth place, is Bromtide. They’re going into the stretch; they’ve gone about half a mile ...”

“Jesus,” I said, even as something like thunder rumbled and a flash of light illuminated the stadium. “What’s wrong with him, you think?”

“Might be the T. rex piss,” said Luther, leaning in, and chuckled. “Had to spray him down with it—otherwise the allos would be all over him. Guess we forgot to tell you that.”

I glared at him before shifting my gaze to Maria and Caleb and finally to De Santo, at the very end, who looked like a kid on Christmas. “Oh, Caligula!” he cried, and clasped his hands above his head. “Beautiful! Beautiful!”

“They’re turning into the backstretch with Caligula on the lead,” said the announcer. “Caligula has a lead now of one length and a half. Right behind him comes Mesozoic Nights. And in there, slipping through on the inside, is—it’s Bromtide! Bromtide is going up on the inside now and in a good position ...”

I refocused on the race even as Maria leapt to her feet and clapped—watching as the Thoroughbred accelerated through the dust like a thunderbolt and the allos' upright tails bobbed; as the mechanical rabbit with the steel gallimimus attached raced along its track, glinting and vibrating. That's when I noticed her, I'm not sure why—the concessions girl with the vending tray strapped to her shoulders, selling hot dogs—way down in the front, but moving our way. And it was the weirdest thing because even though her features were barely discernible I was certain I had seen her before, and in a situation similar to this—having to do with the races, that is—and in a flash it came to me, for she was the very same woman who had visited Hawkins in his cell and had spoken to him in such hushed, conspiratorial tones—about the next race and the uppermost row of the bleachers, about decapitating the snake and a future free of want. And then the sky was flashing and thunder boomed and I turned to look at the storm, and saw, with a mixture of wonder and terror, that it was not one cloud but two; one below the other, and more, that the lower cloud was ascending, not drifting—by which I mean it was being kicked up from the earth, and that, indeed, it wasn't a cloud at all but dust, great, billowing plumes of it.

“Jesus—Maria, Caleb, look at it,” I said, even as the crowd went wild and the announcer related breathlessly, “And Bromtide is now moving up and challenging as they turn for home. It's Caligula and Bromtide challenging head-to-head as they swing into the stretch. And they've only got a quarter of a mile to go. Bromtide has got the lead halfway down the stretch. But here comes Lovely Bones challenging on the outside, challenging boldly. And the battle is on. And Lovely Bones may take it all. It's gonna be a photograph finish. It's anybody's race right up to the end ...”

Maria gasped, staring at the cloud of dust. “Are—are those what I think they are?”

I squinted and saw shapes beginning to materialize—large ones, little ones, shapes of every size and stripe—close enough now to identify, close enough even to—

“We’re in trouble,” I said—even as the dinosaurs herded directly toward us, like driven cattle, as the diplodocuses and brachiosaurs and tyrannosaurs and triceratops stampeded straight for Checkered Flags. “We’re in—like—serious trouble ...”

And then there were screams and a great upheaval from the crowd, and we turned in time to see that the girl with the vending tray had produced a gun, produced it and was pointing it at Se Santo. Pointing it at him even as the sky boomed and Luther drew his own, shooting her in the arm; as the rumble of the approaching dinosaurs intensified and the announcer exhaled, catching his breath, and said, at last, “I think Lovely Bones got the money. I think Lovely Bones was first. It was an eyebrow finish. And Bromtide was the second. Bromtide was second and Caligula and Mesozoic Nights each tied for third. It was very close. That was an eyelash finish ...”

But by then, of course, the cloud was upon us. And as it turned out, I had been right. For it was the Flashback come again.

“THE CAR!” BARKED DE Santo, taking his eyes off the sky. “Get the goddamn car!” At which Luther hustled away and Caleb moved to intercept—until I blocked him with an arm across his chest and held him that way until both men were gone.

“Jesus, man! I could have stopped them.”

“And we will,” I said—even as the great herd crashed the gates and began stampeding onto the field: trampling the fences, toppling the media tower, crushing and goring bystanders. “But first let’s follow them to that car, yeah?”

And then we moved—hurrying after them into the stairwell, ignoring the fact that, in a reversal of the first Flashback, the prehistoric creeper vines and overgrowth that pervaded the venue had started to disappear, to simply vanish without a trace, and so, for that matter, had the rampaging dinosaurs. Nor had we gone far when we came upon the car—one of those ridiculous Hummer limousines which was just as white as De Santo's hat and was already pulling clear even as Luther kicked its rear bumper and pointed his pistol, barking, "You bastard, De Santo! There was enough for both of us! There was enough for both!"

And then he opened fire, Crack! Crack! Ca-crack! —blowing out the rear window as well as the tires, causing the back portion of the vehicle to drop, after which the limo briefly continued on just sort of dragging its hind-end—like a dog wiping its ass—before getting stuck in a quagmire of tar and starting to sink; but not before De Santo climbed out and began staggering back toward us, reeling and stumbling.

Only then did what had occurred become clear: for the Flashback, or mini-Flashback, or controlled Flashback, or whatever it was, had stopped; and now two time zones existed where before there had only been one—the New Mesozoic, in which we had lived and breathed just a moment before (but which now contained only De Santo), and the Modern Era Come Again (in which we existed now). And yet that is not to say they occupied the same space; for between them, blue and opaque, ran what could only be described as a forcefield, a field which crackled and hissed as De Santo stumbled into it and blocked him—as much as any physical wall—from returning.

And, considering the world on our side had been restored to how it was before the Flashback—or at least, as we know now, a stretch of land from Devil's Lake, North Dakota through Checkered Flags, in Kansas—and its people and geography brought back from whatever phantom zone they had disappeared to, he must have wanted that very much. Dear God, how he must have wanted it. I could see it in his eyes as the race-famished allosaurs—who had escaped the storm in front of him only to come slowly creeping back—encircled him and cut him off, trapping him where he stood.

And I could see it as he died—as they ate him alive—still gazing at us (who, from his point of view, would have been rimmed in fire from the stadium lights) and at Checkered Flags; which, having been restored to its former glory, must have shined for him in that moment like Heaven itself.

‘Dog’ is a Palindrome

In the movies they call it a “smash cut”—when the scene shifts so suddenly and abruptly that the viewer is knocked off balance, if only for an instant. That’s what it was like when Puck attacked the nanotyrannosaurs—which we hadn’t even known were there—smashing the silence into a thousand pieces as the animals burst into the clearing thrashing and gnashing their teeth and one of the predators broke off in pursuit of the man with the knife—the man who, only an instant before, had been holding the weapon to Lisa’s neck.

Not that I knew it was Puck yet. That wouldn’t come until after the mini-tyrannosaur had bitten off the man’s head and shoulders (and swallowed them whole) and returned to the fray; after which I snatched my pistol up from the ground and tried to find an opening—mortified that I might accidentally shoot my own dog—and, finding it, squeezed the trigger.

Krack!

I fired twice more.

Krack! Krack!

And then the nanotyrannosaurs were down (but not before one of them had shaken Puck like a ragdoll and launched him into a nearby tree) and we were running toward him. Toward my dog who had gone missing during the Flashback and whom we had long since presumed dead. Toward the broken bundle of fur that had somehow found us and saved our lives.

“Puck!” I cried, trying to rouse him. “Come on, Boy. Wake up.”

“Omigod. Omigod, Nick. Is he—?”

I crouched over him and felt his belly—which was bloated and distended, like that of a starving person—with my gloved hand.

“No. No—he’s breathing. But shallow. Like he’s in a coma.” I looked around the clearing, at the dead tyrannosaurs and the dead man missing his head and shoulders, and at the deadfall, which was scattered everywhere, like rubbish. “It’s going to take time. But look, there’s firewood. And that brook can't be far—not at the rate we've been moving. I say we camp here.”

Lisa fidgeted about nervously. “Here? How is that a good idea?”

“I don't know what else,” I said. “We can't move him. He could have a broken neck, or internal bleeding—I mean, who knows. Besides, Nano-Ts are territorial. Which means the apex predators of this entire area are likely right here, just as dead as that man with the knife.” I squinted at the animal that had killed him. “I hope it choked on it.”

I was referring, of course, to my golden dog whistle, which the man had taken from me and put around his own neck when it became evident that we had nothing else of value.

“My God, Nick, but we're in the middle of nowhere. What if they hunt in packs and not pairs? That would mean there's still—”

“I'm not leaving him like this, okay?” I shot her a glance and she recoiled noticeably. Then, seeing how the harshness in my voice had disturbed her, I took a deep breath—and tried again. “Just, help me with the camp, okay? I can sit with him while you sleep. All right? I'll stay up and keep watch. If he doesn't wake by morning—I'll take care of it myself.”

She looked at me as though she were about to cry. “I didn't say we should leave him, Nick. I— It's just that ...” Her eyes welled up suddenly and she batted away the tears. “Oh, fuck it all.”

And she wandered off—to gather sticks for the fire, ostensibly, but really to avoid saying the only thing left to be said. Which was that in a world where the vanished outnumbered the living by something like 3 to 1—the “Big Empty,” the old man at the filling station had called it—a world without civilization or creature comfort or compassion, which had regressed to the Stone Age and beyond—yea, even to primordia itself—in that world, what could it possibly matter?

I paused as the wind picked up and rattled the leaves. Well, what could it? What was it worth amongst so much human suffering, so much grief and loss? One animal's life. One mixed-breed dog.

I looked at Puck who lay motionless but breathing in the lengthening shadow of the tree.

Just a dog.

And then I did something I had sworn to never again do; something I had promised Lisa I would resist—did it knowing full well what consequence might come in a world populated by ghosts; by disappeared souls; by a few scattered survivors living every minute and every hour—every waking moment—in something like Hell.

I slipped off one of my gloves and laid a trembling hand on Puck's head.

After which, noting the itching sensation in my palms and fingertips, I let the golden eyes open—crustily, sleepily—one after the other, like blinking boils. And I began to see.

THEY'D APPEARED SHORTLY before the Flashback—that strange system of storms which had caused so many millions to disappear and that had brought the terrible lizards; that cataclysm which had re-mapped Time itself—opening one by one over a period of weeks, itching and burning like white phosphorous. I suppose in time we would have sought medical help (although it is difficult to credit, even now, after witnessing the Flashback and its impossibilities firsthand, what could have resulted from that); but, as it turned out, Time was something we had not owned and never would—for it was owned exclusively by them: the masters of the lights in the sky. The architects of the storm.

None of which mattered during the Great Collapse, for by then we'd become like everyone else, struggling merely to survive, and the strange eyes—as inexplicable as they were—had, with the help of a pair of thick gloves, been almost forgotten. Nor, in truth, was this particularly difficult; the eyes, once covered, tended to close their lids and scab over.

All of which was just as well—because I hadn't been able to see through them anyway. At least, not until I touched the dying girl in Seattle—an incident I shall not speak of except to say, that—for a period of time—I saw all her yesterdays and all her hardships; all her life condensed up to that very moment, and more, I saw, for the briefest of instants, what had come after—which had been a thing of such raw beauty and terror it had nearly driven me mad. Indeed, I would have been mad had Lisa not been there to pull me away—nor, for that matter, had the ghosts of the Flashback—millions upon millions of them, pressing down on me from every corner and from every nook and cranny of the world—not driven me to distraction.

Suffice it to say that had been the last time—the last time I had allowed them any free reign: to see, to feel, to live vicariously through the lived experiences of others. After that, the gloves had stayed on. Stayed on as we trekked from Seattle through Tacoma and across the Olympic Peninsula to Aberdeen, where we had hoped to find Lisa's parents, but found only a house with a collapsed roof and a protoceratops nest in its kitchen. So, too, had we lost Puck, who had chased a turkey-like creature into the ruins of a T.J. Maxx in Olympia and never come out, even though a search revealed no other egress but the shattered front doors—which left us no choice but to assume he had vanished in some aftershock of the Flashback.

And now here we were, somewhere between Hoquiam and Ocean City, travelling through the forest instead of following the road because the road was rife with bandits and outliers (one of whom must have spied us through the trees before getting the jump on us shortly after the brook), and no closer to hope than we had been before—indeed, further from it than ever, and with three less bullets in the gun. Worse, another would have to be used to put Puck down in the event he didn't wake up; something which seemed increasingly likely as the eyes in my hand perceived only a mottled fog and Lisa could be heard approaching us through the scrub.

"You're a fool, Nick Callahan. A fool. But I suppose you already knew that."

I allowed my hand to drop before plunking down in the fir needles and just staring into space. "There was nothing. I saw nothing. It—it was like he didn't even exist."

She sat down next to me and exhaled, tiredly.

"He's an animal—what did you expect?" She picked up my glove and offered it to me, but I didn't take it. "You said it yourself; it's like they see memories. The eyes. I don't imagine a dog has a particularly long one. Do you?"

I sighed. All I knew for certain was that I felt numb and more than a little tired. "I don't know. I don't know what I expected. Or what I was looking for. An incident, maybe. Some kind of clue."

She laid her head on my shoulder and stared at nothing, same as me. "What kind? A clue to what?"

"That's just it—I don't know. A clue to what might wake him up, I guess. Something I could say. Something that was important to him."

"His butt was important to him," she said. "A source of endless fascination."

I had to smile.

That's when it happened. That's when he yelped, ever so slightly, and his paw twitched.

I looked at Lisa and she looked back. And then my hand was on him and we were running—Puck and I—down cobblestone lanes lined with streetlamps and through pools of foggy light; through tides of rusted Maple leaves, which leapt and swirled as we passed.

"What is it?" I heard Lisa say, her voice growing smaller, more distant. "What do you see?"

I turned to look at Puck as we ran and saw his tongue loll and his eyes shift—as though he wanted to look behind himself—behind us—but didn't dare.

“Fear,” I said. “Confusion.” An image entered my mind of a dug passage beneath the rear wall of the T.J. Maxx; of the turkey-like thing crawling through it with Puck hot on its heels. “He escaped from beneath the wall and now he’s lost somewhere in the fog. And he’s terrified ... but of what I don’t know. It’s almost like—wait a minute. Wait a minute.” I looked behind him—having heard something huffing and snorting—and saw a fully-grown theropod dinosaur (colored orange and black, like a Gila monster) bounding after us in the dark, gaining rapidly. “There’s something coming—some kind of predator. An allosaur, I think. Whatever it is, it’s closing, and I mean fast.”

“Oh, my God. Nick. Can’t you do anything? H-hello? Nick?”

“Lisa!”

But she was already gone, lost amidst the vision and the ghostly white noise of the dead; constrained to some other time and place—erased from my present condition completely.

UNDERSTAND THIS. WHILE there are several dog breeds known to climb trees—the New Guinea Singing Dog; the Louisiana Catahoula; the Treeing Walker Coonhound, and the Jack Russell Terrier (I know this because I have since read up on it), the Miniature American Shepherd, which is what Puck mostly resembled, is, most emphatically, not known for such behavior. So, you can imagine my fear and consternation when Puck veered for the nearest Maple tree and attacked it like it was a set of monkey bars—even as the allosaurus collided with it directly beneath him and proceeded to do the same, or tried to. Even now I’m in awe of the pluck and determination he showed that day—to seemingly defy gravity in such an impossible way and to dash up the tree’s trunk like that, and then to hold onto the lowest branch in such an unshakable manner—it was truly a sight to behold. Especially when the allosaur began to leap and lunge and to snap at him and he briefly lost a paw-hold; before his hindlimbs kicked in and propelled him the rest of the way—into the tree’s bowl and a relative amount of safety; into a position from which he could run along one of the branches onto the roof of the nearest house ... but didn’t, as he needed to give the allosaur a piece of his mind.

Which he did, barking and yapping and snarling, even as I watched from below like Johnny Smith in The Dead Zone—I even had the collar of my peacoat turned up—standing next to the allosaur but in virtually no danger; inhabiting the scene while somehow remaining apart. Like a ghost.

That’s when the other allosaurs showed up—at least one of them passing right through me—and began to triangulate the tree, at which Puck did run along one of the branches to the house—but hesitated before jumping from the eave; it was, after all, a long way down, even for a man. And that is where he remained—as the predators moved from the tree to the house and effectively surrounded it—after which there was little he could do but to sit on his haunches and try to wait them out.

Which, eventually, he did, although by this time the moon—which was visible through a part in the clouds—was directly overhead, and even I, a ghost, had the sense that several hours had passed. That’s when he retraced his steps to the tree, and, after many false starts, skidded partially down its trunk before leaping the rest of the way to the ground.

“Good dog,” I said, and attempted to pet him, “Smart dog ...”

But my hand just passed through him and he didn’t notice me at all, just sniffed about the ground as he walked in tight circles and finally trotted away. Back up the lane toward the little strip mall and the T.J. Maxx; back through the gloom which was slowly starting to lift.

It was then that the scene changed and I was standing outside the store, standing where I had stood not 24 hours ago, blowing on that dog whistle; where I’d finally admitted to myself that he was either out of range or had been taken by the Flashback. Puck was there, just sitting on his haunches. I knelt in front of him and studied his face. Studied the patch of black fur around one eye and the eyes themselves, as deep and brown as any person's. Saw the doubt and desperation and the confusion and the complexity. And I saw something else, something I can only call, for lack of a better term, his humanity.

The wind gusted and trash skittered across the empty lot.

And yet there was something more—something deeper—wasn't there? Something just beyond my perception. And this was something—which was not human. A thing which, now that I've had time to understand it, was as pure and ephemeral as light itself.

In short, a thing utterly without guile or self. Perfect. Irreducible. Uncreated.

And then Puck barked, causing me to jump, and the moment was past, and I came out of it to the sound of a campfire crackling and Lisa shaking and cursing me awake, after which she said, with a clear tremor in her voice, "There's more of them out there. More Nano-Ts. We have to go, Nick. Now."

I LOOKED AT THE CORPSES of the first Nano-Ts, which were being picked over by compies, the small but deadly predators which always accompanied a kill, then deeper into the dark, where I detected no movement. "How do you know? I don't hear anything ... just the compies."

"I did hear them," she said, and picked up a stick. "Two of them, at least, calling from different directions. They're triangulating us. We have to go, Nick. We have to go right now." She looked at Puck, her face half-painted in firelight. "I'm sorry."

I looked at him too—at the patch of black and his closed eyes, at his paws which had been bloodied by the tree's rough branches. "I—I can't. I'm sorry. Because ... there's something in there. Something

I need to see. The eyes—Puck—there's something they want to show me. Something I need to understand."

I approached her suddenly and gripped her arm. "Something that might save us all—but I need more time!"

That's when we heard it—both of us—the unmistakable bark of a nanotyrannosaur, which was quickly answered by another, closer. Right at the tree line.

She cursed and jerked away. "Tell them!"

I looked at Puck and then back at her, then back to Puck ... when I noticed the revolver laying in the grass. "Ocean City—it's not that far." I rushed forward and snatched up the gun. "There's still two bullets. Take it."

She froze, looking at my extended arm, then into my eyes, which she searched. "You bastard ..." She welled up suddenly and intensely. "You fucking bastard."

I shook the gun. "Goddammit, Lisa. Take it."

She reached up slowly and took it.

"I will meet you in Ocean City. I'm ... I'm just going to try this one last time—okay? If it doesn't work ... I'll leave him. I promise."

"No—you won't." She smiled like a crazy person. "Because they're going to come in here and rip you to shreds..."

"You don't know that. The fire will keep them away. The smell of their dead buddies ..."

She swiped at her cheeks and sniffed loudly. Then she moved toward the opposite tree line, the one facing the road—and paused. She turned around. "You're a fool, Nick Callahan. A fool. But I suppose you already know that."

"Get out of here," I said.

And she went.

I rushed over to Puck and dropped to my knees.

"Okay, buddy. You need to show me what you got, and show me fast, all right?" I placed my hand on his head and squeezed slightly.

“You remember Dad. He used to take you fishing—like, every Sunday. Remember that? Well, he used to say that to understand a man you had to walk a mile in his shoes. That, to open a man’s heart, you had to know something about his journey; about what made him tick. So ... I’m walking in your shoes. I’m walking in them right now. And what I need to know is ... what will wake you up, okay? I need you to show me. Show me, Puck. Be a good dog one last time. Come on, buddy. Let it go.”

And then I closed my lids and let my hand take over—let the golden eyes re-open and peer through Time itself. Let them read Puck’s yesterday as the compies chittered and the Nano-Ts barked, coordinating their attack; as Lisa made her way to Ocean City and the lost souls of the Flashback began to cry and howl their laments.

THE TRAIL HAD GONE cold. I could see it in his eyes as he trotted to a halt at the edge of Highway 109 and sniffed at the air, his white coat blowing.

Come on, boy, I thought, beginning to worry. I was standing by a green and white road sign which read: OCEAN CITY—22 MILES. You can do it. Don’t give up on us.

He sat on his haunches and looked around, panting. At the abandoned motor home Lisa and I had dozed in only a few hours before; at the cracked and potholed highway which had been overrun with prehistoric lichen.

Come on, buddy. Go sniff up that RV—it’ll put you back on the trail. Just get up and get moving. Because that man with the knife is probably watching us—Lisa and I—right now. So are the Nano-Ts, like they are in the present. And we’re never going to make it without you.

Then, like a miracle, he was up again—his tail wagging furiously, his ears twitching puckishly—investigating the Coachman, tearing off toward Ocean City. Barking and yelping, which rode the wind like an echo.

I opened my eyes—my eyes, not the alien things in my hands—and saw the branches shaking deep in the dark. They were on the move again—the Nano-Ts—closer even than before. They were getting ready to strike; to do what they did best, which was to rend and kill. I shut my lids and refocused, feeling as though Time had fast forwarded, as though it had leapt ahead.

Show me, I thought. Show me now, or forever hold your peace. Show me or see us all join the choir of the damned!

And that's when it happened: that's when I saw it, the moment that had changed—still would change—everything. That moment Puck had skidded to a stop after surpassing our location and begun to cock his head, and to tilt it quizzically; to look from the road to the tree line and sniff at the briny air—to bolt into the woods like a maniac and, apprehending the situation quickly and accurately, to attack the Nano-Ts.

For that was the moment the man with the knife had tested the dog whistle. The instant in which he had placed it to his lips and blown once, hard and long, and that he had grinned his rotten-toothed grin and said, "Now kick that gun over here, nice and easy. Come on, now. Nobody wants to see Missy here all cut up like Sharon Tate."

Indeed, it was the moment that had led to our rescue and to Puck being in a coma; and to him being in limbo, like the victims of the Flashback and its great and terrible Vanishing, trapped in Time, caught between worlds. A place I knew I could never have left him, not if it had cost me everything I had.

Which it may have, I thought, as I came up out of the trance and looked at the dead beast that had killed the knifeman—for I knew what I had to do—and also through the firs, beyond which Lisa had disappeared. It may have.

Then I was up; I was on my feet—snatching the man’s knife from the forest floor, falling on the carcass like a jackal—scattering the compies in a flurry.

Drawing the blade across its belly so that its innards exploded out like writhing red snakes.

“Hold on, Puck,” I shouted, as I waded into its guts. “You’re going to like this! Going to jump right to attention, I guarantee it ...”

I slashed and slashed—clearing away the bowels, cutting away viscera—even as the compies returned, leaping and scurrying. “Hold on, buddy! We got this—”

And they descended on me, or rather ascended me, scurrying up my legs and back, piling up on my shoulders, attacking my face as I located the stomach and cut it open and began feeling around. “Ahh—ahh—ahh ...!”

I collapsed amidst the guts and gruel, batting at my face, at their little beaks and talons, even as the firs shook and I realized I could smell them—the Nano-Ts—hovering in the black between trees, getting ready to pounce.

I pulled one of the compies off and wrung its neck before climbing back up and reaching into the T’s stomach again, after which I felt something unusual, something round and smooth, and withdrew it quickly—only to realize it was one of the knifeman’s eyeballs.

“Jesus!” I cursed, and dropped it—even as the compies swarmed over me like mutated sewer rats, like blood-sucking bats, causing me to fall into the viscera again and to roll up like a fetus, to cry out in anguish—knowing, at last, that it was truly over; that there would be no escape for us this time, neither Puck or I, and wondering what Lisa would do now that she was all by herself—and how she would survive—wondering if she would always hate me for the decisions I’d made and for my bullheadedness, and for a thousand other—

“Goddamnit, Nick, find the fucking whistle—I got this!”

I swiped the blood from my eyes and looked at her—saw her stomping and stabbing compies as though she were a mad woman, as though she were fighting in the trenches of France. She knew. She had figured it out herself. Woman's intuition, perhaps, who knew?

And then I was up and reaching into the thing's stomach, desperately feeling around, praying that the stuff that felt like macaroni and cheese wasn't the knifeman's brains—and yet knowing it was—finding the golden whistle suddenly and unexpectedly and placing it in my mouth.

Where I blew on it as hard as I could, sending a frequency only Puck could hear pulsating through the air.

After which, like gray ghosts, the Nano-Ts began to emerge—slowly, cautiously, not pouncing suddenly as I'd expected, but surrounding us in a loose but ever-tightening circle. Corraling us.

"I'm sorry," I said, as the Alpha bull approached the corpses one at a time and sniffed them carefully, thoroughly. "You should have gone to Ocean City."

She looked at me in the dark, the fire having long gone out. "And live ... I suppose," she said. She smiled wanly. "For what?"

And then something moved and we turned to look at it, and it was Puck, standing on all fours and just as awake as could be.

Puck. Who growled at the dinosaurs threateningly even as he crept forward like a puma and finally paused between us—facing off with the bear-sized predators resolutely, glowering at them without fear or hesitation.

The wind blew, and the trees swayed. The Alpha bull sniffed at the air. My heart thudded in my chest even as it looked at the corpses and then back to Puck. Then it did it again.

And then it swung its great head away and turned, its massive bulk pivoting smoothly, gracefully, and glided back into the trees, after which the others began to peel away and follow—until they were gone, all of them, and we were alone.

Just us and Puck, who was still covered in the predators' blood. Just us and a shepherd mutt—ostensibly an American Miniature—who had been on one helluva journey, but was home now.

A mutt who licked our faces as we surrounded him and looked at us with such seasoned calm and selflessness that I was both spellbound and awed, as though I were in the presence of something at once human and more than human—something which was the epitome of love and faithfulness—something perfect, something divine. Something which came up the same thing no matter which way you turned it.

“Dog” is a palindrome.

The Elephant Slayer

It was called Netherville, which wasn't too bad a name compared to some of the settlements I'd been to: places like Misery, Montana and Malaise, North Dakota; Grimburg, Texas; Forsaken Falls, Idaho. I guess you could say that American towns have always had ominous names—that it was part of our frontier heritage—but then, I wasn't in America anymore, I was in Canada. Edmonton, Alberta to be precise. The Big E, as they called it.

As for how I'd come to be there—I'd rather not talk about it, and it's not important, anyway. Suffice it to say I'd caught a broadcast on the radio of my new Cadillac Escalade (Thanks, Butte Auto Sales, I left a silver dollar in the break room) which had urged me to go north to a town called Paradise—a town I'd mistaken for Paradise, Alberta, and so overshot by about 500 miles. Luckily for me, I'd come to Netherville before running out of gas (the Escalade's tank had been completely full, go figure; that's why I'd chosen it) and found a friendly settlement in spite of my folly.

At least, it had been friendly so far. In my experience, these things could—and often did—change on a dime. Which is about what I had on me when I walked into the 'Goodbye to All That' Saloon and ordered a drink at the makeshift bar; a bar whose counter had been fashioned from the scorched wing of an airplane.

"Keep it," said the bartender, a largish man with thick stubble and bad teeth, as he pushed back the coins. "First visit's on us, always."

He moved toward the back door—which was propped open with a rifle; probably due to heat from the firepit—walking awkwardly, haltingly, as though he had a bad hip. "Beer's out back—in the snow."

I glanced around the room as he went: at the other patrons—bearded men, all of them—who had peeled off coats and hats; and at one who hadn't—a lone figure sitting in the corner ... with a pair of crutches nearby.

"That includes the mastodon; the mammoth. The roast elephant, whatever you want to call it."

He shuffled back, slowly, arduously, twisting the cap off a bottle of Molson, setting it down. "It's good—fresh. The meat, eh, not the beer. It was harvested only yesterday."

He laughed a little and shook his head. "Whatever he does with that ivory, I'll never know."

I looked at the bottle of beer, which had foamed over onto the counter—onto the Cessna's battered wing. "What who does with it?"

"What?"

"What who does with the ivory?"

He lifted the bottle and wiped around the rivets, fussily, fastidiously. "Oh, yuh. You're the new guy. Why, Gavin Carter, of course. Our mysterious and storied Great White Hunter."

"Our Nanook of the North!" hollered a nearby patron, lifting his sloshing glass. "The Elephant Slayer of Alberta."

"Or at least the frozen shithole that used to be Alberta," said another.

I must have looked confused.

"Local hero," explained the bartender. "Big-time trophy hunter. Lives in that house up on the ridge; the one with the orange roof—the old Riblet Mansion. Just helped himself to it one day. But he's a hero because he hunts the mammoth—and I mean consistently, successfully—and keeps the town fed."

A patron leaned in abruptly, thoughtlessly—as drunk people are wont to do—his breath reeking of Molson. "Speakin' a which—I'll take some more of that, eh? The stew."

"Well, that depends, Liam," said the bartender. "Where is your bowl?"

The man looked around, dazed and confused, until his glassy eyes settled on the back of the room—and the booth next to the solitary figure.

"Never mind, Liam," said the bartender warily. "I'll get it for you. Just relax." He gave me a little bow. "Excuse me."

"Of course," I said.

And then I took my first drink and paused—savoring it. Savoring its bite and its body and its bitterness and its perfection. Worshiping it; and focusing upon it to the exclusion of all else. Because the truth of it was, drinking it was like drinking civilization itself.

The drunk, meanwhile, was just staring at me: as though he knew me, perhaps, or maybe not. As though he loved me, perhaps—but maybe hated me too. As though there was something on his mind that he just had to say—if he could just untangle his thoughts and find the right words. If he could just get his mouth to open and his tongue to—

"Don't," I said.

And he didn't—talk to me, that is—after which the bartender returned and fetched me another beer—saying, as he twisted the cap off and set it down, "Compliments of the young lady in the corner."

I looked over my shoulder and saw that the figure had unzipped its coat and removed its scarf and hat—revealing a woman with black, unkempt hair and harsh, asymmetrical features (and yet attractive, for all that) who couldn't have been more than, say, twenty-five. A woman who looked at me with such startling clarity and matter-of-factness that I almost averted my eyes—but didn't, because I didn't want to appear weak. Instead, I just smiled—confidently, breezily (at least that was my schtick), raising my beer bottle. As though I wasn't just Travis Hayes, UPS delivery driver from Denver, Colorado, but Travis-fucking-Hayes, Carefree Stud of the Apocalypse.

That's when it happened; when the fight broke out, erupting in a flurry of broken glass and expletives (and flying booze), toppling the nearby barstools.

"Hey, goddamnit!" shouted the bartender, as I scrambled clear of the melee—which, surprise! involved the man who had been staring at me— "Hey, hey, hey!"

And then everything was noise and fury as others joined in and I turned to check on the black-haired girl (although why I am not certain; she could clearly take care of herself), but saw only an empty booth. Everything was chaos and confusion as I stared into her corner and noted the missing crutches—but couldn't for the life of me figure out where they—or she—had gone.

I looked to where a wooden door swung back and forth in the wind, letting in gusts of snow. The side alley, of course—!

And then I was moving—double-timing it, as we used to say in the corps—dodging a pair of brawlers, bursting into the alley; pausing by a heap of garbage as I noticed there were no footprints in the snow and thus no way to—

At which my vision winked out and I could see only stars, like scratches in space-time itself. At which I saw only comets—which darted and swirled, ember-like, as I fell.

“AH, AH! HERE HE COMES. You see now, Eska? You didn't hit him so hard after all. Our sleeper has awakened.”

I blinked, clearing my eyes, as the room swam into focus: as the floating spheres of light resolved into candle flames and the hovering pink blur became a face, which smiled—patiently, fatherly. Elusively, like a wolf.

“Welcome to the Roc's Nest,” said the face—its skin cracked like bleached leather, its teeth straight and white. “Please, have a look around. I'm Gavin Carter. And this—this here is Eska. My adopted daughter.”

I looked at her even as I became aware of my pounding head: at her strange, harsh face and dense, un-manicured brows; her large, stout teeth—which were not straight and white—her eyes like chiseled obsidian.

“Go on, Eska,” said the man—Carter—who appeared to be in his late 50s. “Be a dear and give Mr. Hayes a smile. Show him some of that primal charm you have; and in such great abundance. Come, come, now.”

I watched as the corners of her mouth crept up, slowly, hesitantly. Indeed, she could be charming—even beautiful—when she wasn’t braining you with a board, that is (or whatever she’d used).

I looked around the room, which was more like a great hall—at the pillars made of immense tree trunks and crossbeams carved from maple or walnut; at the astounding collection of mounted animal busts which adorned every wall and flat surface.

At last I managed, “How—how do you know my name?”

“It wasn’t difficult,” he said, taking a sip from his wine glass, dabbing at the corners of his mouth. “You still had an I.D.”

I slapped my back pocket—my ankle catching on something as I shifted—but it was gone, of course. My wallet. That’s when I looked down—having heard the ka-chink of metal—and realized I was shackled to my chair.

He frowned almost sheepishly. “An imposition, to be sure—but a necessary one.” He looked at something on the table which I recognized as my old military ID. “Can’t have a trained killer just wandering about the house—now can we?” He paused, studying my face. “I must say ... you don’t exactly look the part.”

“Well, people can be full of surprises, can’t they?” I glanced at Eska, who just stared right back. “Your ‘daughter’ is certainly capable of a few. Wouldn’t you say?”

“Oh, most certainly,” said Carter—and added: “People, I mean. People are full of surprises. Not Eska. Not from me.”

I raised an eyebrow.

“I know her too well ... having reared her since she was a pup.” He paused, appearing wistful—even morose—before changing the subject; abruptly, I thought. “I, ah, couldn’t help but to notice you appreciating my collection. Do you hunt, Mr. Hayes?”

I looked at the nearest mount, a triceratops head with a broken horn (and a frightful visage), wondering what the circumstances of its death had been. Had it been charging—with the Flashback in its eyes, perhaps—and thus aware that it had an opponent? Or had it been unaware, just mulling its soft grasses, until the bullet entered its brain?

“No,” I said, finally, turning my attention back to him. “Can’t exactly say as I am. It—it’s never seemed like a fair contest to me.” I jerked my leg against the chain—twice—to make a point. “Does it to you?”

“Pshaw,” he protested. “You speak as if we’re enemies. As though this were some contest between you and I, personally. On the contrary, Mr. Hayes. It’s a collaboration.”

I’m afraid I just stared at him.

At last I said: “Okay—why not. I’ll bite. What are you talking about?”

“I am talking, Mr. Hayes ...” He stood and began pacing the length of the table. “—about legend. About myth and memory—and the securing of one’s place in the natural order of things.” He withdrew something from his housecoat as he walked—a pipe; but didn’t light it. “Posterity is what I’m talking about. A place at the table of the gods. That, and endings. Inevitabilities.”

He paused and struck a match. “One last and penultimate hunt.”

He lit the pipe and waved out the match, then turned, slowly, regarding me through a cloud of smoke. “Atatilla, is what I’m talking about. Queen of the Mammoths. The, ah, Leviathan of the Steppes, as they say. I intend to kill her. And you, my lost and wayward friend, are going to help me. By acting as my driver.”

“Your driver?”

“Yes. I’d normally call on Eska, but, as you’ve no doubt observed, she is—at present—incapacitated.” He glanced at her across the table. “Isn’t that right, Love?”

She took her eyes off me long enough to nod at him, stoically, silently.

"She, ah, understands, you see." He moved around the table toward her. "And not only the language but, how shall I say it? The lay of the land."

I watched as he took up position behind her and placed his hands on her shoulders.

At length I said: "What is it, Carter? And what is she? Cro-Magnon? Neanderthal? What do you mean— 'the lay of the land?'"

"I mean, she understands who she is ... now. And also, where she belongs." He fussed over her as she stared straight ahead—straightening her collar, repositioning her hair. "More importantly, she understands who I am. She can even say it—can't you, Love?"

She looked up at him with what seemed like respect, even reverence.

"Go on," he cajoled—gently. Softly. "Who am I?"

"Ma—ma—master," she managed at some length. "You are ... Master."

He veritably leapt with joy. "Very good, Eska! Oh, very good! Oh, that is absolutely wonderful. Most excellent. Now tell me, what I am the master of?"

She hesitated—as though searching her memory.

"E-everything," she said at last, the words seeming to come easier, if not any faster. "M-m-me. The animals. All—all the world."

"Yes, yes," he said, and practically capered. "Very good ..."

He looked at me as though he assumed I'd be impressed. "Well? What do you think? Does she pass the test for Homo sapiens sapiens?"

But by then my anger had boiled over and I'd stood, abruptly, jerking the chain on my ankle as I moved toward him, dragging the chair after me.

"Look—you indoctrinate all the Cro-Magnon fucking girls you want ... If you don't have me out of here inside of 60 seconds I'm going to—"

"Genghis!" he shouted, and snapped his fingers, the sound of which echoed in the hall. "Come along, now. Right now."

And before I could do much of anything he—it—was there, entering the room from a nearby corridor and snarling as it advanced, crouching and tensing as its foreclaws splayed; tapping its retractable sickle claws over the smooth, polished floor.

Stalking me as I fell, tangled up with the chair; and blanketing me with its shadow—as only a Utahraptor could.

"FREEZE!" BARKED CARTER—AND the mottled orange and black Utahraptor froze, its knife-shaped head only inches from my own, its breath smelling of fish and rotted meat. "Hold."

And the Utahraptor held: snarling and growling—hissing, even, like a snake.

"There, see? There's nothing to be afraid of," said Carter, calmly. "Now, if we can avoid any further outbursts—let's continue, shall we? Where was I ..."

"Call it off," I said, shrinking away from the thing's muzzle, staring at its yellowed teeth (between which I could see bits of decaying flesh). "Call it off, Carter."

"Ah—well. So much for the vaunted bravery of the U.S. Armed Forces, eh?" He snapped his fingers quickly, crisply. "Kennel." But the Utahraptor didn't budge—indeed, I was pretty sure it only moved closer. "Genghis!" he barked. "I said, 'Kennel!' Now!"

At which the predator did move, although grudgingly, defying its master to the extent that it circled me quickly before breaking off and vanishing the way it had come, its tail whipping after it.

"There, you see? I can be reasonable." He paused as though he were looking at me. "Good heavens, Mr. Hayes! You look as though you've seen a ghost."

I pulled myself together as my breath came and went in ragged gasps. “What was that? Your hunting dog?”

“If you like.” He paced over to the far wall—which wasn’t, in fact, even a wall, but a towering black curtain—and stood to one side of it. “I want to show you something.” To Eska he said: “Leave us. Tend to Genghis.”

And she was gone.

He drew open the curtains.

“Behold, if you will, the Terror of the North—Ursus Maritimus Tyrannus, otherwise known as the Pleistocene Polar Bear.”

My jaw dropped a little as the massive thing came into view—mounted not in a pose but as an enormous rug, which had been affixed to the wall, itself painted black.

“Magnificent— isn’t she? ‘There ‘mid grand icebergs slipping from the cliffs, or on the drifting floes that choked the tide ... gigantic Polar bears, so grim and gaunt ... in solitary majesty abide.’” He turned to face me in the semi-darkness. “Isaac McLellan.”

“Look, Carter. Would you just get to the—”

“But she wasn’t solitary, Mr. Hayes—not this one. Nor did she have a sleuth of cubs. And yet she was—indisputably—a mother. No, what she had, my wayward friend, was a cub. A cub who was but an infant then but has since matured—at an accelerated rate, of course—into adulthood.”

My eyes must have grown large as awareness dawned. “Eska. You’re talking about Eska. But how could—I mean, the Flashback only happened less than—”

“Come now.” He looked at me with something like pity. “Surely you’ve encountered it; that aberration in the Flashback by which a person— seemingly at random—begins to age—rapidly, I mean, exponentially—out of all context with their surroundings? Well, that’s what happened to Eska. As for the hows and whys: such as why that process halted at her current state, or how she came to be living with prehistoric bears in the first place—who can say?”

I stared at the massive hide, at the flattened body and carefully preserved claws, and at the great head, which was big as a T. rex’s. “How much does she know?”

“As with everything, only what I have taught her, of course. That I found her mother already slaughtered—by a cold-weather predator mightier even than she.” He drew the curtains and walked toward me. “A story that was true—if not entirely factual.”

I got up slowly, shaking my head. “And that was you ... The Great White Hunter of the Wastes. How ironic.”

“Ironic, Mr. Hayes?” He paused and lifted his chin. “How so?”

“Because you seem so prissy and effeminate. I guess it’s just hard to—”

And I lunged at him—chair and Genghis be damned—before something struck me in the head (a fire poker, as it turned out; wielded by Eska herself) and rendered me unconscious, if only for an instant.

“Really, Mr. Hayes,” he said, circling me where I lay. “These outbursts will be your undoing. Irregardless, there you have it. Everything you need to know in order to help us with our hunt. You’ve even seen the bar we must surpass—the gold standard, as they say; the mount stuffed by Fidelio himself—my taxidermist, God rest his soul—before he showed Genghis an affection at the wrong time and place, and when the animal was in the wrong mood.”

He removed a coin-like medallion from beneath his shirt and studied it, wistfully. “Dear Fidelio, who fashioned this.”

He leaned close to show it to me and I saw a gold disk with an engraved bear on it—Ursus Maritimus Tyrannus. The Terror of the North. Eska’s adoptive mother. “A reminder of my greatest prize to date.”

He turned toward Eska. “Thank you, by the way. Although I must caution you; do not enter the room without my permission again, eh?”

I looked back and forth between them.

“Y-yes, Master,” she struggled to say. “Eska is s-sorry.”

He looked down at me. “Well, there, see? She learns. No need for another confrontation at the top of the stairs ... isn’t that right, Eska?”

I looked at the splint on her ankle and the single crutch she was using.

At last I said, “I’ll help you with your hunt, Carter. We—we’ll kill this ... Atatilla. From the truck, isn’t that right? Like cowards. But I’m going to kill you too, you bastard. Somehow, someway. You just watch.”

Again, he looked at me with pity—or something like it. “I’m sure you’ll try.” And then he shouted down the hall: “Genghis, my boy! Snap to, old friend! It’s time to release the hounds and hunt again!”

I GUESS I DON’T KNOW what I expected when Genghis—having paused outside the vehicle’s windows to sniff at the crisp air—leapt forward suddenly and vanished into the gloom. I suppose I was expecting the same result as the last twenty times he’d done this; which was nothing (although he had, at one point, emerged with a dead possum in his mouth). What I was not expecting was the wooly mountain that emerged—with Genghis clinging to its back—a thing easily the size of an industrial dump truck; which thundered past us on our left even as Eska pressed the knife to my throat and Carter readied his rifle—indeed, even as I put the Jeep into gear and prayed, having already been nicked once, that I wouldn’t displease her, the fucking driving critic, again.

“Very well, Mr. Hayes—that’s it,” said Carter, aiming his rifle—a .460 caliber Weatherby Mark V he’d been droning on about since we left—squinting into its scope. “Now draw alongside—that’s right. Step on the gas.”

I stepped on the gas, disturbed by the lack of visibility—the lack of road—terrified we might plummet into a ditch (or even a chasm), knowing I had to do something—anything—to stop the madness.

“Faster, Mr. Hayes,” he persisted, as the Jeep bounced and jolted and he struggled to maintain his aim. “Faster, damn you! Align us with her head. Quickly, or we’ll lose them both.”

I went faster—the great mammoth thundering along beside us as Genghis tore at her flank and the snow continued to fly; as Eska held the knife to my throat; and, due to the truck’s jouncing, nicked me again and again.

At last I shouted: “You don’t have to do this, Eska—all right? Can you understand that? You don’t have to do what he says. Nobody does. Listen to me.”

I stared at her through the rearview mirror: at her strange, dark eyes and sharply-chiseled features; at her tangles of black hair and large, uneven teeth, until she diverted her attention back to Carter, who was focused, exclusively now, on the stampeding elephant—and appeared almost to ask his permission.

“Ah, don’t worry about him,” I said, re-concentrating on my driving. “Can’t you see he’s busy?” I glanced at Carter—who ground his rifle scope silently, intensely. “He’s too focused on that pachyderm.” I jerked the wheel once so that the Jeep rocked violently and he lost his target. “Isn’t that right, Carter?”

“Eska!” he snapped.

I stiffened as her blade—having relaxed briefly—re-pressed against my throat; only harder, sharper, drawing new blood, then nodded, quickly, indicating the mammoth.

“Look at it, Eska,” I said, having to raise my voice over the sound of its trumpeting, “Look at her. Look at how mighty and beautiful she is—how unspoiled and magnificent. What does she remind you of—Eska of the Great White Bears, of the animals who found you when you were lost and without hope; when you needed food and shelter and compassion—what does she remind you of and who in all the world could kill such a unique and powerful beast?”

I glanced at her in the mirror even as a shot rang out and she jumped—her dark eyes looking at Carter as he worked the bolt and ejected the casing; her focus shifting to the elephant at it cried out thunderously and increased its speed.

“Who, indeed, Eska,” I said. “But the Master of All?”

She looked at me through the mirror and we locked eyes immediately—even as I continued to drive, blindly, recklessly.

“Yes, Eska. M-M-Master. The master of you—and of all living things. Who but he could have—or would have—killed your mother?”

I reached out suddenly and yanked the medallion from around Carter’s neck.

“Your mother, Eska,” I said, shaking the engraving—forcing her to look at it. “This, right here!”

And she took it; even as I faced forward briefly and began to slow down, and the giants, still at war, quickly pulled ahead—vanishing at last into the snow-speckled gloom.

CARTER WAS ENRAGED, incensed, speechless.

“What—what is the meaning of this?” He gripped his rifle, trembling with anger, then looked from me to Eska, his face swollen and red. “What have you ...” He exploded suddenly, violently, pathologically. “What have you done, you animal?”

I watched her in the silence.

“M-mother,” she managed, staring at the gold coin, processing, it seemed, in the still, dark vehicle. “M-master.” She looked at me as though struggling up from dream—and finally back to Carter. “Master ... kill ... Mother.”

Carter shook his head, desperately, I thought, even fearfully. “Pshaw! This is nonsense! Killed your mother! What rubbish. Come here, child. Let me—”

And then the knife entered his throat and he gasped—gasped and choked and gargled—as the blood bubbled up and he wretched on it; as Eska twisted the blade.

He opened his door and fell to the ground, dropping his rifle which discharged—the sound of it echoing along the hills—prompting me to get out as well.

“Hold on, man!” I shouted, slipping and sliding around the hood, unzipping and yanking off my coat—crouching over him as he rolled in his own piss and blood. “We’ll tie the sleeves together; make a tourniquet ...”

But he only got up and staggered further away: holding his throat, hemorrhaging into the clean, white snow, crying out as he slipped and fell and struck his head ... even as the ground shook with mighty foot-falls, with the approach of something like a god.

That’s when she emerged, the mastodon—Atatilla herself, having defeated Genghis—and lumbered to within a few feet of us, her shadow falling over us like a shroud.

“Easy ... easy,” I said, stepping back slowly, gazing up at her face (which seemed positively ancient, positively eldritch). “It’s all over now. It’s—everything’s done. You’ve won, old girl. You’ve survived.”

The wind blew and the snow fell, clinging to her trunk and the folds of her face, sticking to her eyes, like cotton lint.

“I—I ...” Carter managed, the blood bubbling up like Karo syrup, like thick, black ichor, congealing on his chin and at the corners of his mouth, pulsing from his throat like little bursts from a squirt gun. “I ... am your master,” he wheezed at last, and stared up at the thing in defiance, in cold-stone obstinance, smiling red, smiling like a lunatic, which I suppose he was, refusing to concede—to give even a centimeter.

And then she lifted her great foot and brought it down, missing me by just a few scant feet, and smashed Carter flat—raising it a couple seconds later to reveal a body thin as a bear rug but with its head and limbs intact. Leaving him like a trophy, like a warning to all who would challenge her, before lumbering back into the gloom and receding like a ghost, a legend—Atatilla, Slayer of Carter—master to all she surveyed.

YOU MIGHT SAY WE MADE a strange couple, Eska and I. It's certainly possible, considering the odd looks we garnered on our return to Netherville.

Whatever the case, I saw no reason to part now that we'd established a means of communication (Carter had begun to teach her American Sign Language, which I was familiar with from my days as an interpreter). More to the point, I could never have simply abandoned her; not to the snowy wastes, and not to Carter's empty mausoleum (whose fuel stores for the generators were nearly depleted anyway).

And so we just went, stopping in Netherville only long enough to refuel the Jeep and to stock up on supplies, before beginning the long drive to Paradise, Montana, and also, more specifically, a place called Barley's Hot Springs.

For we had caught the broadcast again (the same one I had heard earlier) on our way in from the wastes. A broadcast calling itself Radio Free Montana—which had promised, among other things, a climate utterly unlike other settlements, and that, and I quote: "Here, indeed, is where civilization begins!"

It seemed worth another try.

As for this document and my need to put it to paper—and deliver it to the town repository—who knows? Maybe I just wanted to make sure history was recorded right. God knows, it rarely is.

And finally, for whoever may find this and wonder at its context—in a future, perhaps, where that context has become mere dust and memory—I offer this:

Welcome to the Big Empty, the world after the Flashback, a world in which most the population has vanished and where dinosaurs roam freely. You can survive here, if you're lucky, and if you're not in the wrong place at the wrong time, which is everywhere and all the time. But what you'll never do is remain the same, for this a world whose very purpose, it seems, is to change you, for better or for worse.

I recall watching Eska study the engraving on the way in, her face full of sorrow and yet complexity too, realizing, even then, that I need never fear her again, in light of which, I'll add:

It is my most fervent hope that it change you for the better.

The Return

It was funny, that I should think of childhood for the second time that day (the first being when we'd descended the great tree next to the starship while still in our spacesuits, like kids playing astronaut). Still, there it was—just an image, really, a vignette—in this case a scene from a movie I'd seen at the East Fork Drive-in as a little boy (Escape from the Planet of the Apes, as I recalled, with Roddy McDowall and Kim Hunter), the one where the returned astronauts take off their helmets—as Maldano and I had just done—revealing themselves to be not men at all but advanced primates. As a metaphor, it was apropos; we hadn't shaved since well before the moon.

I looked at the pure, perfect sky and its few scattered clouds, like white cotton candy. "Okay. So it wasn't a nuclear exchange or a bolide impact, I think we can safely rule those out." I squinted at the sparse blue dome. "No contrails, no homogenitus, no ash. EMP burst, maybe. But not a large igneous province—Yellowstone, say. Not a caldera. That leaves pandemic—something which had to have raced through the population like wildfire. It's funny. All this time dreaming about home, only to end landing via the Domsday Protocol."

"Yes, well. Like I said," said Maldano. He looked out over the Gulf of Mexico, which sparkled in the sun. "Could have been a malfunction. All that protocol actually means is that Mission Control hasn't been detected. The fact is—we don't know. It could be that Houston's grid has been down, long enough for emergency power to have dwindled. It's just that—what, what is that? There, low on the horizon."

I followed his gaze to where a handful of queer lights could be seen twinkling amongst the clouds. "I'll be damned if I know. They—they don't look like aircraft. More like navigation buoys, but in the air. I honestly can't tell if they're manmade or not. Look, over there, still more of them." I pointed due south. "It's like someone strung Christmas lights in the sky."

I looked at Maldano and found him already looking at me, sweat beading along his brow. Both of us, I think, were unnerved by the silence, or at least the lack of human activity, and by the crashing drone of the sea. I peered along the waterfront beyond him; it was just us and the bearberry bushes.

"Nobody on the road, nobody on the beach," I said at last, quietly.

The tide rolled in and then out again.

"I feel it in the air; the summer's out of reach," added Maldano.

"Empty lake, empty streets—the sun goes down alone."

"I'm driving by your house—"

And together: "Though I know, you're not hoome."

And we moved out, trudging through the sand toward the boardwalk, singing Don Henley's "The Boys of Summer"—trying, as we walked, to ignore the nearby high rises (hotels, mostly), which looked on in perfect silence, stoic, inert, monolithic, like tombstones.

UNFORTUNATELY, BY THE time we reached the first commercial zone (Cornerstone Plaza of Cocoa Beach), we had no better idea of what had occurred than before, only that the entire suburb had become wild and overgrown—more than what seemed possible in the 21 months we'd been gone—its parks and lawns become mere patches of blowing tundra, its structures choked in moss and vine.

I picked an orange from a nearby tree and rubbed it against my spacesuit. "So here we are—in search of the black swan. The unexpected event that led to—all this." I peeled the fruit as I scanned the shopping center, settling on a storefront with a car crashed through its window. "This—what shall we call it? Death by invasive species." I split the orange down the middle and tossed him half of it. "This lost country. 'Untrodden by man, almost unknown to man ... a world tenanted by willows only, and the souls of willows.'"

We raised the portions to our mouths and paused, staring at each other. One of us had to be the Guinee pig, who knew what toxins had bled into the ecosystem, or what poisons had entered the food chain. But which one?

“Algernon Blackwood,” I said, attributing the quote—when it became clear he wasn’t going to waver. “The Willows. 1907.”

And then I took a bite—chewing it slowly, as Maldano watched—swallowing, wiping my mouth with a gloved hand. “It’s good. Sweet. Go ahead. Try it.”

He hesitated before peeling off a wedge and placing it in his mouth, at which he closed his eyes and seemed to melt, hanging back his head, working his jaw in a circular motion, reopening his eyes—pausing suddenly.

“What?” I asked. “What is it?”

He tilted his head, peering into the branches. “Isn’t that strange?”

I followed his gaze into the tree but, alas, saw nothing. Which, of course, was precisely the problem; there was nothing—no oranges, no leaves, no uppermost branches, it was as though someone or something had picked the treetop clean.

“Someone has a helluva reach,” said Maldano.

I looked around the lot: at the lichen-covered Public Market and the Jersey Mike’s Subs with the Prius in its window, at the Vietnamese Nail Salon and the El Buzo Peruvian Restaurant. “We should split up, canvas the area. Make sure—there’s nothing else.”

“Yeah,” said Maldano. “I think you’re right.”

I headed for the Public Market. “Make a sweep of the strip mall. I’m going to check out that grocery store.”

He laughed a little at that—which caused me to pause.

“Orders—Hooper?”

I half-turned, but didn’t make eye contact. “Sorry?”

“I mean, in all this? This Big Empty? This ‘world tenanted by willows ... and the souls of willows?’”

There was something in his voice. Something subtle, something contentious.

“Call it what you like,” I said, and continued toward the market.

I'D BARELY HAD TIME to investigate when I heard him shout, “Hooper! Get out here!”

I looked up from the newspaper I'd picked off the rack—a paper with the headline, DAYS OF DELICATE TERROR: Disappearances, Weird Weather Rock Nation—and tried to triangulate him.

“Outside the Great Clips! Hurry up!”

I folded the paper and took it with me, exiting the building through the jammed-open front doors, and saw him crouched over the asphalt in the corner of the L-shaped shopping center, beneath the Great Clips' cornice. “What is it?” I said. “What did you find?”

He stood and indicated the sidewalk.

I stared at the pavement, which was webbed with roots and lichen, and saw a single shoe lying on its side—a Nike LeBron, which had been stained maroon like the surrounding concrete. More, there was something sticking out of it—two somethings, I realized, broken and brownish-yellow—tibia and fibula bones, obviously, snapped in two midways up their shafts, crawling with maggots and flies.

I used the newspaper to wave away the insects. “Jesus,” I said. “What in the hell happened here?”

I scanned the scene, which looked like someone had spilled a 5-gallon bucket of maroon paint (and then flailed around in it), saw an impression the size of a pizza pan in the dried blood. “What the hell is that?”

I glared at Maldano but the bearded astronaut only stared back at me.

I knelt over the impression, or rather the impressions, for there were other, smaller ones next to it—three, to be exact—and studied the configuration.

“This is a—”

“A print, that’s right,” said Maldano. “Further, I’ll characterize it. Or at least what it isn’t. It isn’t the print of anything that was walking the earth when we left.” He added, “It’s not that of a bear, for example.”

He knelt beside me and indicated the larger impression. “Yuh, see, this would have been left by the lowermost extremity of the metatarsals, the foot bones that connect directly to the tibia and fibula—locked together, for strength.” He indicated the smaller ones. “And these, these are the phalanges, or toe bones—see how they’re splayed to support the animal’s weight? That’s because this was a big creature, 7-8 tons, at least. Other than that, they’re not so different from our own; here’s the proximal phalanx, which is connected to the metatarsal, and the middle phalanx, and the distal phalanx. Or at least that’s where they would have been beneath the flesh, which is what left the impress—”

“Stop it,” I snapped, and stood abruptly. “Just ... Look. What are you saying?”

“I’m saying this was left by a member of the theropoda clade of the Saurischia order, division Carnosauria.” He looked up at me as though it should be obvious. “Whose family was probably—”

I grabbed him by a system umbilical and yanked him to his feet, began shaking him like a ragdoll. “Talk sense, damn you! What are you saying? That whoever that shoe belonged to was attacked by a—by a—”

I paused, trying to get a hold of myself, as his face hovered mere inches from my own. At last I released him and quickly stepped back, breathing heavily, repulsed by my own behavior.

“I—Jesus, I’m sorry. It’s just ... it’s just that none of this makes any—”

That’s when I saw her: like a ghost, or an ashen specter, just staring at me through the glass, through the Great Clips’ window, not close to it but much further back, crouched by one of the chairs. That’s when I saw her (and she saw me): standing abruptly, stumbling over a broom, regaining her balance in time to bolt for the back door and to disappear into the dark.

"Follow me," I said, rushing to the door, yanking it open. "Hurry!"

Alas, it isn't easy, running in a spacesuit, even if they have been streamlined considerably since Apollo and the shuttle program. The truth of it is that by the time I burst from the building and back into the blinding sun she was already halfway across the lot—and nearing a stand of trees. Indeed, if not for what happened next, I would have surely lost her there; but the bird had other ideas.

The bird. The thing from the sky.

Even now I have a hard time believing it—that such a thing could have ever existed in the first place, much less come to exist again. But the truth of my eyes was undeniable as it swooped in out of nowhere and attacked the girl: its great wings beating furiously as it pecked and stabbed at her with its beak (itself the size of a small kayak) and tore at her with its talons, its eyes flashing malevolently as it attempted to spirit her away but was frustrated repeatedly by her kicking and flailing. And yet it did rise—with her still in its hold—and I sprinted toward them: leaping and grabbing her by the ankles even as the bird lifted us both; absorbing the brunt of the impact when it finally loosened its grip, covering and protecting her as it hovered and pecked and squawked.

Until, finally, the attack had ended—more suddenly even than it had begun—and we were alone (in that moment before Maldano hurried to check on us), at which point I looked at the girl and she looked back—smiling, crying, bleeding profusely—and knew her to be the most beautiful thing on Earth.

AS IT TURNED OUT, SHE lived at the Discovery Beach Resort, one of the very towers that had looked down on us earlier (and from whose uppermost floor she had watched us touch down). And while I was mystified at first by her choice of residence—there was no electricity to power the elevators, for example—her modus operandi quickly became clear: for it was, quite simply, one of the highest and most defensible positions in town (the trek up to the 10th floor alone, especially with her in tow, had more than proven that). What was more, it was high enough from the earth that what had happened below could—if you just listened to the soft jazz sifting from her boombox and tried hard enough—almost be forgotten, at least for a while.

None of which is to say I wasn't shaken as I sat next to her bed and examined the tourniquet on her arm—which we'd fashioned out of a haircutter's drape while still at the Great Clips—and worried over the appearance of the wound, which had developed red streaks around it and was oozing clearish fluid.

"Well now, here comes Doctor Number Two. I shall need your name as well, sir," she said, and smiled, toothily, earnestly.

"Hooper," I said. "Captain Glenn Hooper. Bluespace Aeronautics."

She saluted sharply with her good arm and lowered her voice. "Pleased to meet you, Captain Hooper."

I chuckled in spite of everything. "Just Glenn," I said.

"'Just Glenn'—he says," she quipped. She lifted her chin and arched her back, to gaze out the window behind her. "And I'll tell you the same thing I told him. Ain't no one who's been to Mars is 'just' anything."

She yawned and stretched in the thin nightshirt and I looked away. "Well—thank you. But we were just doing our job. I'm sure you had one that was just as important. Didn't you, Miss—?"

"Cunningham. Rachael Cunningham." She rolled her head to look at me. "I was a teacher; an adjunct. Comparative politics. Political methodology. That sort of thing."

Her eyes were cow-brown with emerald highlights.

"That sounds interesting, indeed," I said—calmly, clinically. It seemed especially important to be so; I wasn't sure why. "And necessary."

She hrmpled. "In the age of Tucker? What did it matter?"

She was referring, of course, to Donald J. Tucker, the 45th President of the United States.

I looked at my moonboots, knowing I should let her rest but not wanting to go. “Whatever happened to him, you think? In this—this Flashback, as you called it.”

She faced the ceiling as though in deep thought. “Who knows. He’s probably golfing in an underground bunker somewhere. It’s funny; I saw a caravan of trucks come through town just the other day, flying his flag—like their own little mobile nation-state.”

She lolled her head to look at me and we laughed, softly, quietly.

At length she said, “You must be terribly uncomfortable in that, your spacesuit. You should go check the other units, see if there’s anything to wear. I’ve pretty much cleaned out the women’s necessities, but there should be plenty of men’s clothing; not to mention razors and shave cream. I’ll be fine, really.”

I stood reluctantly and moved to go, but paused in the doorway. “That wound, you know, it has me concerned. You’ll need to be monitored, closely. Is there a thermometer?”

She shook her head.

“Yeah, well. We’ll look for one.”

“There’s a pharmacy at Cornerstone Plaza, just a few blocks away. You can take my Kawasaki; the key’s on the mantle.” She laughed. “But go gently—the thing’s 46 years old.”

I must have grinned. “You don’t say? I had a ’78. KZ400. It was red.”

“So’s this one.” She seemed to think about it. “Isn’t that strange?”

“I guess something’s just click into place like that,” I said, and regretted it immediately. “Listen. You get some sleep, you hear?”

“I will, if you doctors will leave me alone.” She smiled, toothily, earnestly.

"You know it's funny," she added, as I was closing the door. "I used to lay awake at night and wonder if I'd ever have anyone to talk to again. And now I've got two—more than any woman could need."

I stared at her through the crack in the door, unsure how to respond. Then I eased the door gently closed and went to join Maldano on the patio.

WE SETTLED INTO A ROUTINE—Maldano taking the morning while I looked in on her in the afternoon—ending our days in deck chairs while drinking whiskey sours and gazing at the Sargasso Sea (and also our starship, which stood sentinel below us like a Minuteman missile). None of which changed the fact that she seemed to be getting worse, not better, or that, in spite of her denials, she appeared to have lost mobility in her hand and fingers—a sure sign of infection, at least with an animal bite. The fact was she needed antibiotics, and soon. The fact was we'd need to return to the shopping plaza at Cocoa Beach.

"Yes, but. With a pair of .22 calibers weapons? How is that a good idea?"

Maldano was skeptical.

I thought about the weapons in question, which were the only ones she had: a Rimfire Pistol and a Model 60 Rifle, both of them well-maintained. "I'm not seeing that we have much of a choice—are you? You heard what she said: the gun stores have been emptied. But you've felt her lymph nodes, her forehead—she's burning up. No. We can't wait on this, Mark. It's going to have to be done. I say first thing in the morning."

He swirled the liquor in his glass, appearing to think about it. "I guess it's hard to say no to the last woman on Earth."

"There's others," I said, and took a drink. "People have survived." I gazed at the queer lights as they shifted and pulsed amongst the clouds and the whiskey burned my chest. "As for how many ..." I looked across at him and his loud Hawaiian shirt. "You're right, of course. She might as well be. Who knows."

"Who knows," he said, and took a drink.

We watched as the gray waves crashed and the tide rolled in and out, as the light itself began to fade.

"Our Lady of the Flashback!" he exclaimed at last, and raised his glass to the sky. "This—this Dinosaur Apocalypse; this Time Storm which has cleansed the world." He swirled the glass, sloshing whiskey. "Our brown-eyed, toothy Galatea; our Aphrodite on a scallop shell. The veritable Eve to these two Adams."

He swung his glass close to mine, as though he wished to toast. "To starting again; and to being home. 'Muses no more what ere ye be, in fancy's pleasures roam; but sing (by truth inspir'd) wi' me, the pleasures of a home.' He rattled his glass. "Eh?"

I hesitated before meeting him, I'm not sure why. "John Clare. The Village Minstrel. 1821." I tapped his glass (a little harder than I intended). "Scoal."

"Mm," he said, and drained his glass. "She'd like that, I bet. Some poetry. I've been reading to her from the Bhagavad Gita—but it's slow going. Found it wedged in amongst all those Eckhart Tolle books in the hall."

I paused, looking at him. "You—you've been reading to her?"

"Well, sure. Beats all that small talk and temperature taking you've been smothering her with." He laughed. "Woman does not heal by bread alone, mein Captain. Nor does lamb always trump harvest—regardless of what it says in the Bible. She's smart; I treat her like it. I think she misses teaching. Terribly."

I stared at the lights in the sky, wondering again if they were intelligently directed or some kind of natural phenomenon. "I didn't realize it was a competition," I said, absently.

"Neither did Abel," he jibed, and shoved me in the arm.

I drained my glass as he looked out over the ocean and the silence reasserted itself. "But then, everything is, I suppose," he said, after seeming to think about it. "I mean, isn't that what's going on out there, right now—a competition for survival? For reproduction?" He chuckled, softly, and with little discernible humor. "Sharks versus marlins; monster birds versus women—she said it was a quetzalcoatlus—Tucker fanatics versus, who knows?"

I looked at our starship: at its stainless-steel hull which shown cool and blue in the building's dim shadow. "No. No, I don't think so," I said. "We've ... transcended all that, to some extent. I mean, look at it, Mark. Look at what we've accomplished."

He followed my gaze, holding his glass loosely, tenuously, his eyes blurry and red. "It—it looks like a giant hard-on," he said, and tittered. He began looking for the bottle. "Or maybe a middle finger. Like a big 'Fuck You' to God."

I watched as he stumbled through the sliding glass doors into the kitchen. "You should lay off that," I said. "We've got a big day tomorrow."

But by then he was retching into the sink and I was alone, just looking at my empty glass, wondering, a little amused: Did he see himself as Abel? Or did he see himself as Cain?

I thought about Rachael, sleeping in her thin nightshirt, having more than any woman could need; and about myself, and how I saw myself. And then I dozed, dreaming of home—which was curious, since, like Maldano, I had never really had one (hence one of the reasons we were chosen for Mars). A dream which soon gave way to the faint smell of blood and an impulse I could not define; and of gliding through dark water—stealthily, surefootedly—like a predator, or a wraith.

I'M STILL NOT SURE where it came from, the ramosaurus, as I called it (a kind of allosaurus, but with little ram-like horns on each side of its head), although I'd hazard a guess, based on its later behavior, that it had been watching us for a some time; since well before I'd started the Kawasaki's engine and kicked it into 1st gear—tearing up the street like gangbusters as Maldano hung on for dear life and the carnosaur pursued, chasing us all the way to the shopping center, where we quickly climbed off and rushed in.

"Get back," I shouted at Maldano, "Get back!" —even as the animal's snout darted between the doors and stopped; suddenly, abruptly, jarring the metal framework, cracking the glass into spiderwebs.

"It's okay," gasped Maldano—breathing heavily, holding his chest. "It's okay." He laughed suddenly, euphorically. "Ha! Its head is too big for its own good."

We watched as it struggled and gnashed its teeth—its dark tail whipping back and forth outside, its eyes close to the glass. "It's all those denticles and jaw muscles," I said, finally. "Cost of doing business, I guess."

"Apex predator's burden," said Maldano, and indicated the door to the pharmacy, which was lazily open.

We went in even as the ramosaur withdrew, opening and closing its little claws—shaking itself off.

"Let's hope it doesn't get the idea to use those horns," said Maldano. He handed me a green plastic bag. "We're looking for Amoxicillin and Penicillin. Also Doxycycline, Metronidazole, Clindamycin. If you see Dicloxacillin, grab that too. And painkillers. Ibuprofen and Tylenol."

He went to the glass partition which separated the pharmacy from the rest of the store and peered out.

"What are you doing?" I asked.

"Making sure there's no light pouring in anywhere, no opening. Nothing that thing can get in through. So far, so good." He took out his flashlight and pressed its lens against the pane. “And also that there’s nothing in here with us. I don’t trust this glass.”

I pulled the blinds to let in more light—in time to see the ramosaur’s tail disappear behind the Holiday Inn next door, followed by its head peeking around the corner—cautiously, stealthily. “Our friend doesn’t give up easily ...”

I turned to look at Maldano, saw him still peering into the darkened store. “We’re going to have to ditch the bike and slip out the back,” I said. “How’s it looking?”

He began to back away from the glass, slowly, blindly, as though he were in a daze. “I—I can’t do it. I’m sorry.”

I watched as he drew the pistol from his belt and chambered a round, then pointed it, waveringly, at the partition.

“What the hell are you talking about?” I took a step toward him. “Maldano. What are you talking about?”

“We—we have to go. Now. I—I have to go. Out the front doors. Out—”

“What is it, Mark? What do you see?” I shoved past him and put my own light to the window, squinting as my eyes adjusted, thinking I saw something move.

And I did. I did see something move, several somethings, a hundred—a thousand, maybe more. For the store was crawling with centipedes, huge ones, and ones still larger than those, ones ranging from 3 feet to 8 feet and some several feet across, ranging in color from lime green to faded salmon, from drab brown to sickly ochre, all of them winding and weaving, gliding on scurrying legs, flopping and scrambling over themselves, glistening like moist, wet clay.

“We have to go!” he shouted, dropping his gun, and bolted for the door.

“Wait! Maldano! It isn’t safe!”

I moved to follow him but froze, adjusting the rifle sling, looking at the shelves and shelves of medicines. Rachael. She was counting on us.

Rachael in her thin white nightshirt—in her room full of soft jazz and incense; in her tower by the sea. Rachael who was not simply a woman but something akin to home itself.

I rushed to the shelves and began searching for Penicillin, for Doxycycline and Metronidazole, for painkillers of any kind. Searched for them and found some, even as the motorcycle sputtered to life.

“Hurry up!” shouted Maldano. “We have to go! Now!”

But I couldn’t, of course; I had to gather the medicines. I had to save Galatia, our Aphrodite on a scallop shell. Had to think of home and a final place to rest. “It’s not safe, damn you!” I cried, sweeping pill bottles with my arm, filling the plastic bag. “That thing, it’s still out there!”

I gazed out the window at the Holiday Inn, saw the creature creeping forward with its body slung low, intently, single-mindedly, like a wolf or a great cat. I jerked to look at Maldano and saw that he too was aware of it; that he had apprehended the animal and was trying to figure out the motorcycle’s gears—that he was kicking down into 1st, which was correct, and releasing the clutch. And then he leapt forward, suddenly, and travelled about 50 feet—before the engine stalled and he was immobile again.

I dropped the bag and unslung the rifle, smashed the window with its butt. Then I aimed and ground the scope, sighting the dinosaur between its eyes.

I must have gone into what they call hyperfocus, because it gets foggy after that. All I know for certain is that I understood in that moment what was required to move forward; that Eve would need her Adam and that I would need to choose survival, for this above everything was what the world now demanded. And I knew, also, that while a .22 caliber round was unlikely to stop the creature, a fresh kill would surely give it pause, enough, perhaps, for me to escape through the back with the medicines—even if it meant running straight through the centipedes.

I lowered my sights to Maldano, who tried to kickstart the bike and failed, then raised to try again.

It would have to be fresh. It would have to be alive.

And then I fired—once, twice. A third time. Knowing the battery was directly beneath the seat. Knowing it was shielded only by a thin layer of plastic.

Knowing it had exploded only when the cover blew off and white smoke started to billow—after which, shaken and confused, Maldano turned to look at me—pitifully, mournfully; resigned—and the animal pounced, pinning him to the pavement like a moth on cork, clamping its jaws about his head and chest, pulling him asunder as though he were full of blood red centipedes.

I AM RUNNING, RUNNING along the back of the strip mall, gripping the medicine bag in one hand and the Model 60 rifle in the other, trying to get home. I run the entire two blocks to the Discovery Beach Resort—my heart thumping in my chest, my eyes stinging with something like tears—until I gain the door and go in—pausing only briefly to catch my shuddering breath; beginning the 10-story climb as though I were scaling Babel itself.

When I get to the unit it is dark, the generator sitting silently out on the deck (the door to which is open), the curtains rustling in the breeze. But there is no time to waste, none to delay, and I quickly gain the bedroom—at which I realize the bed is empty and she is no longer there, the sheets left in a jumbled mess, the draperies blowing as if to accentuate the solitude.

I look for her for hours, all throughout the building, kicking in doors which were previously unexplored, searching the utility rooms and common areas and dining accommodations, doubting my very grip on reality; until at last I burst through a door and find myself on the boardwalk, back on the beach, feeling cold, all of a sudden, and shivering, feeling as though my flesh were thin as paper. Feeling, for a reason I cannot explain, that I must return—to the starship, of course, the only home I have ever known, but also to myself, who would never have slain his own friend, his own brother—no matter the madhouse the world has become, or the perceived stakes of any given situation. Until I find myself stumbling from the boardwalk onto the beach—and across the sand like a drunkard—collapsing at last at the base of our starship, raising a hand, which trembles, to its steel.

That's when I remember them, the queer lights in the sky. That's when I slide to the sand as though having no bones—gazing at them disoriented, knowing them to be alive. Suspecting, in my heart, that we have somehow been judged, and that by doing what I've done they have judged me again. Fearing, in my mind, that Rachael has never existed, or, if she has, has done so only at their pleasure, their humor. Their terrible intent. At which I begin to crawl upon the sand like a snake, gripping handfuls of granules and coughing and gasping as though dying, seeking the edge of the world and the nightmare; groping for a way back into reality itself.

After which I stand, teeteringly, and stumble on, banished and shunned, naked and alone, bearing the mark of Cain.

Copyright © 2020 Wayne Kyle Spitzer. All Rights Reserved. Published by Hobb's End Books, a division of ACME Sprockets & Visions. Cover design Copyright © 2020 Wayne Kyle Spitzer. Please direct all inquiries to: HobbsEndBooks@yahoo.com

